THE SOCIETY OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

Fifteenth Annual Re-Union.

EARLY in February a local Executive Committee, selected in pursuance of the provision of the by-laws, met at the residence of the Recording Secretary, in Brooklyn, General Newton presiding.

The Committee comprised : Major-General Henry W. Slocum, Major-General E. L. Molineux, Major-General James Jourdan, Brig.-General Calvin E. Pratt, Brig.-General Francis E. Pinto, Brig.-General S. L. Woodford, Col. Samuel Truesdell, Col. James McLeer, Col. Charles N. Manchester, Col. James H. Platt, Col. William H. Paine, Major E. W. Brueninghausen, Major James L. Farley, Captain Henry C. Ellis, Sergeant Henry C. Larowe, Corporal James Tanner; and they appointed a sub-committee, composed of Generals Newton, Slocum, Molineux and King, to wait upon the Mayor and solicit his co-operation in the reception to the Society of the Army of the Potomac. The Mayor, Hon. Seth Low, entered heartily into the spirit of the Re-union, and accepted the position of Chairman of the Citizens' Committee, about to be formed.

The Board of Aldermen appointed the following Special Committee on the reception, and to report as to the propriety of an appropriation by the city : Messrs. James Kane, George J. Collins, John A. Quintard, Moses Engle and William C. Bowers.

Upon their report, the Board appropriated five thousand dollars.

The Board of Supervisors also appointed a committee, namely : Messrs. Henry O. Collard, Thos. Harold, Jr., Edw. J. Thomas, Theo. Maurer and Eugene F. Barnes.

Upon their report that no further appropriation of money would be required, it was voted to devote the County Court House to the use of the several Corps for their meetings, and to decorate the county buildings.

The citizens of Brooklyn manifested a most generous spirit, contributing freely in money to an amount, including the appropriation by the Board of Aldermen, in excess of the needs of the Re-union, and the sum of thirteen hundred dollars and upwards was turned over to the city after all expenses were paid. It is proper to add that no city has surpassed Brooklyn in the generosity, hospitality and enthusiasm which characterized its welcome to the veterans of the Army of the Potomac.

The following comprises the officers and committees who had charge of the reception. To the efficient and most admirable work of the several committees the Society is indebted for the complete and unqualified success of the Re-union :

The opening day was bright and beautiful. At an early hour the members wended their way to the place of meeting of the Society and of the several Corps. The headquarters of the Society were at the Assembly Rooms of the Academy of Music, and of the several corps in the County Court House and the City Hall, all of which were handsomely decorated. A grand triumphal arch spanned Montague street at the junction with Court, upon which were the familiar faces of Lincoln, Grant and the four Commanders of the Army of the Potomac—McClellan, Burnside, Hooker and Meade. Surmounting the central arch was the Goddess of Liberty, and on either hand were cannon and piles of balls, while the pillars were covered with the names of the famous battles with which the name of the Army of the Potomac is inseparably connected. On the Fulton street side were the words, "Welcome, Army of the Potomac," and filling the spaces on the arch were the names of McClellan, Burnside, Hooker, Meade, Grant, Kearney, Reynolds, Sedgwick, Warren, Sheridan, McDowell, Newton, Wright, Wadsworth, Hancock, Slocum, Sickles, Molineux, Fowler, Emery, Hartranft, Stannard, Catlin, Tracy and Jourdan.

The Corps meetings were held at 10.30 A. M. Their proceedings are inserted after the proceedings of the Society.

The General Society met in the Academy of Music at 2 P. M.

BUSINESS MEETING.

General Newton, President of the Society, in calling the meeting to order, said :

Comrades : Everything bids fair that we shall have a most pleasant and agreeable time here. The citizens have exerted themselves to their utmost, and the local committee in charge of affairs have developed great business talents. But, gentlemen, in the midst of our joy at meeting together, we have to cast a glance back through the past years and note some of the changes. Some gallant spirits have fallen. Among those whom I have to mention specially are Major-General Humphreys and Major-General Weitzel. It is fitting that we should pay a proper tribute to these comrades, who have departed hence.

I am glad to see by looking over the faces of the members now present, that there is a fair prospect that we shall have a large number to attend our meetings for years to come. Gentlemen, I will conclude my remarks by reminding you, in the words of the constitution, of the objects of this institution, which cannot be repeated too often.

Article second says : "The object of this Society shall be to cherish the memories and associations of the Army of the Potomac, to strengthen the ties of fraternal fellowship and sympathy formed from companionship in that Army, to perpetuate the name and fame of those who have fallen, either on the field of battle or in the line of duty with that Army, to collect and preserve the records of its great achievements, its numerous and well-contested battles, its campaigns, marches and skirmishes."

And, gentlemen, I have to remind you that the programme for this day fully occupies every hour of the time till about eleven o'clock at night. It is necessary, therefore, that we should expedite our business here. We are not a debating society or a parliament, but are assembled for the purpose stated in that article; and, although it says Cushing's Manual shall be the guide, I don't believe there are two men present who have ever read Cushing's Manual; so we should be guided by common sense alone. (Applause).

General King, the Recording Secretary, presented the printed report prepared by him of the last meeting of the Society, at Washington, D. C., in 1883, which, upon motion, was unanimously adopted as the minutes of the Society.

General McMahon, Treasurer, submitted the following report for the period from May 15, 1883 (last report), to June 11, 1884.

Committee.

On motion the report was adopted.

A motion was made to strike out paragraph 2 of section 9 of the by-laws, and to substitute for paragraph 2 of section 10 the constitutional requirement that the Vice-Presidents be selected by the Corps and elected by the Society. Motion carried.

On motion, section 2 of article 1 of the constitution was amended, so as to include all orators and poets of the Society.

The President appointed the following committee to nominate places for the next meeting of the Society: Gen. Locke, Gen A. E. King, Col. Truesdell, Gen. A. J. Smith, Col. J. S. Nicholson.

The committee reported: Baltimore, Md., Richmond, Va., and Portland, Me. Baltimore, Md., was chosen.

Gen. McMahon, as presiding officer of the Sixth Corps, stated, that by the unanimous vote of that body he was directed to put in nomination for President of the Society for the ensuing year, the name of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant.

This nomination was seconded by the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth and Cavalry Corps.

A ballot being called for, it was taken and resulted as follows:

Total number of votes cast.....	282
Necessary to a choice	142
Of which Gen. Grant received.....	276
Scattering.....	6

Upon motion, Generals Slocum, Chamberlain, Barnum, Hartman and McMahon were appointed a committee to advise Gen. Grant of his election and conduct him to the meeting.

The Vice-Presidents from the several Corps were then announced by their respective secretaries, and their names are given on the first page of this report.

The present Treasurer, Recording and Corresponding Secretaries were re-elected unanimously.

At this moment, General Hancock appearing on the stage, he was greeted with cheers : and, in response to loud calls upon him for a speech, he stepped forward and said :

COMRADES : I am very much in doubt whether this is in order or not. The President says it is. I think we have reason to congratulate ourselves that we are in such good hands. The citizens of Brooklyn have enabled us to come together here, and I am certain, from my knowledge of the people, that this Society will be treated in a most hospitable way, and that the meeting will not be excelled by any in the past.

I was warned, gentlemen, as all of you have been, that time presses, and if I say very little it will be due to the hint of the President when we first started out. I thank you for your courtesy and kindly greeting, and I hope to see all of you and much of you while you are here the next two days. (Applause.)

The committee returned with Gen. Grant, who was received with great applause and the most enthusiastic demonstrations.

President Newton then said : Comrades, I have the pleasure of introducing to you your new President. You know him already.

REMARKS OF GENERAL GRANT.

COMRADES OF THE SOCIETY OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC : I accept the trust which you have put upon me to-day, and feel highly flattered that you should have selected me—one who has never been, except as an honorary member, a member of your Society. But in years back, twenty years ago, our relations were intimate and close, although I was not your direct commander even at that time. But my headquarters were always with you during that period, and I had an opportunity of witnessing what the Army of the Potomac did during that eventful year just as well as though I had been your immediate commander. As I followed your retiring President just one year at the Military Academy, where I knew him intimately, I am very glad to follow him in the same order in this new position. If I am restored to health, as I hope to be by the time of the next annual meeting, I will expect to devote the time, whether it is one or two days, to whatever exercises are to be gone through with by the Society ; but, in consequence of my present condition,* I shall not be able to stay with you to-day or to be with you to-morrow. I regret not being able to hear the most excellent address which I know is to be delivered to-night. I know it is excellent, because I know the man who is to deliver it. He was a member of my staff during the last two years of the rebellion, and I can assure you, you will be interested. I can't say I have seen it, because I don't think it has been written.

The speaker concluded amid loud cheers and great applause.

A resolution was offered recommending the passage of the bill before Congress providing for the purchase by the Government, for its archives, of the sketches and etchings of battles and campaigns of the Army of the Potomac, known as the "Forbes Historical Art Collection."

On motion, the resolution was laid on the table.

A vote of thanks to General John Newton, the retiring President, was passed, and the meeting adjourned, and the members proceeded at once to take position in the line of the parade then forming.

Lowering clouds and a slight drizzling rain were a forcible reminder of the old times when the Army of the Potomac never moved without a storm.

The column moved promptly, and was in all its features the finest and most interesting parade which Brooklyn has ever had.

The grand stand, erected against Holy Trinity Church, was under the supervision of Col. Charles E. Bridge, and some time before the hour for the parade was filled with the prominent citizens of Brooklyn, ladies and gentlemen and invited guests. General Newton acted as reviewing officer, and was flanked by Mayor Low. The streets along the entire route were thronged with people, and the public offices and numerous private dwellings were brilliantly decorated. The parade was under the command of Brigadier-General C. T. Christensen, Grand Marshal, the Second Division National Guard being commanded by Brigadier-General William H. Brownell. The order of the procession and participants are best set forth in the circular for the parade issued by Gen. Christensen.

Winchester Britton, Chairman, and other members of the Reception Committee, were handsomely entertained by the Brooklyn and Oxford Clubs, and the members of the Military Order of the Loyal Legion enjoyed the thoughtful hospitalities of the New York Commandery at Everett Hall.

Visiting organizations were handsomely entertained at the Fourteenth Regiment Armory by a committee of ladies and gentlemen, the latter veterans of the Fourteenth and Grand Army Posts.

EVENING SESSION.

The drizzling rain increased to a heavy storm; but, despite the inclement evening, the Academy of Music was filled at an early hour. The scene was very brilliant. The auditorium was a solid waving, tossing, smiling sea of faces before half past seven o'clock, and the first gallery was also filled to its utmost capacity by that time. Thereafter both were overflowing. The setting of the stage was a camp scene, with a woodland background. The white tents were guarded by the picturesquely costumed Second Fire Zouaves (One Hundred and Sixty-fifth Regiment, New York Volunteers). In front, with the same guards, were stacked rifles and bright, shining brass four pounder mountain howitzers. The banner of the gallant "Fighting Fourteenth" very appropriately occupied a position on the right hand side of the platform, and a wooden monument, shaped and bearing inscriptions commemorative of deceased generals, was prominent on the left hand side.

Immediately above the footlights in gas letters a foot high were the words:

"WELCOME, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC."

Underneath this hung the portrait of Lincoln framed in flowers, and below this again, amid tents and guns and mimic trees, were fifty or sixty of Brooklyn's best known citizens mingling with distinguished strangers.

On the fronts of the boxes were fans of flags and festooned bunting and shields of States, the sturdy Northern sisters, Massachusetts, Connecticut and Pennsylvania, showing their arms side by side with Georgia. Streamers of bunting hid the fronts of the galleries, and fans of flags lit up by "sunrays," and punctuated with State seals and emblems and the good-luck-inviting horseshoe, were ranged along, while from the lower edge of the lower gallery hung the portraits of the Union Generals—Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Burnside, Hooker, Meade, McClellan, Wadsworth and Hancock.

Nearly a thousand members of the Society occupied the parquet. The late hour at which the parade was dismissed causing the President to delay, General King instructed the band to play several of the old familiar songs, and led the grand chorus in a rendition of "Marching through Georgia," "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp," "The Battle Cry of Freedom," "John Brown's Body," "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," and "The Sweet Bye and Bye," with a fervor and volume of tone to which even the Academy was unaccustomed.

The scene is thus described by the Brooklyn Eagle:

"At eight o'clock Dodworth's Thirteenth Regiment Band, which occupied the orchestra seats, struck up an old war-time air. The faces of 2,000 men who heard it lit up at once. They were almost all old Army men—the fragments of the regiments which fought the Army of Potomac's battles—and the music was hard to listen to without evincing some enthusiasm. The band changed to "Marching through Georgia." That settled it. A veteran with a smiling face, a wiry figure and eyeglasses, sprang up between the band and the audience, and facing around swung his arms on high and shouted the words of the song. There was a wild, rolling cheer through which the band's strains struggled, and then with hands and feet beating time and hats and handkerchiefs waving, the great crowd shouted the old, triumphant words:

"Hurrah! hurrah! we'll sound the jubilee;

Hurrah! hurrah! for the flag that makes you free!

So we sang the chorus from Atlanta to the sea,

As we were marching through Georgia."

The enthusiasm grew by what it fed on. It was a great scene. The band warmed to the occasion, and its full power of melody shook the house. Every repetition of the chorus swelled stronger than the last, and before the air was over every man in the Academy was on his feet, laughing and shouting, slapping his comrades' shoulders, swinging backward and forward and throwing his whole soul into the music. The ladies in the boxes and the most grave and dignified of the generals and citizens were carried away with the veterans. All on the platform stood up and sang with enthusiastic fervor, and from the boxes dainty handkerchiefs waved and clear soprano voices led the singing.

The band stopped, and there was a moment's comparative silence. A burly veteran in the middle of the hall stood up, and in a strong voice shouted:

"Come, boys! One more! Three cheers for the old flag!"

All that had gone before was comparative silence to the roof-shaking, long drawn-out hurrahs and "tiger" that followed this. Then came regimental shouts and war cries, greetings from men in the rear of the house to men in front, hand shaking and wild laughter. The re-union had come, and the audience was delirious with patriotic excitement.

"What foolishness!" said a young gentleman in the front seats.

"No, sir," an older companion replied. "That is genuine feeling, and they must express it."

The air the band was playing changed again, and "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, the Boys are Marching" set every foot to beating time loudly, and the chorus was absolutely deafening.

Meanwhile the recognitions went on. A man would rise and stare at another man and then shout "Hello —," half doubtfully. The other would turn and stare for a moment. Then both would bound into the aisles, rush toward each other, and clasping hands say: "Why, the last time I saw you was at the battle of South Mountain," or "I heard you were killed at the battle of the Wilderness."

Again the music changed. It was "When Johnny Comes Marching Home Again" this time. The rollicking, careless, soldierly strains brought the house down again. After a moment's hesitation, in doubt about the appropriateness of the sentiment, up jumped every man who had heard the song around the old camp fires, and yelled in chorus:

" When Johnny comes marching home again,
Hurrah! Hurrah!"

On the repetition of the chorus the wiry, smiling, eyeglassed veteran stood up, and facing about again shouted:

" I bought a chicken for fifty cents.
Hurrah! Hurrah!
I bought a chicken for fifty cents.
Hurrah! Hurrah!
I bought a chicken for fifty cents,
And the son of a gun flew over the fence,
And we'll all drink stone blind
When Johnny comes marching home."

The ladies were the foremost in expressing approval of this noble resolution, and sang the chorus with as much spirit as the veterans themselves.

Then came a compilation of old war-time melodies, "All's Well," "The Battle Cry of Freedom," "Glory Hallelujah," "Three Cheers for the Red, White and Blue," and the crowd was carried away by each of them."

A 8.30, in the absence of the President, General William H. Browne, Senior Vice-President from the Sixth Corps, said:

COMRADES, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: In the temporary absence of the President of the Society of the Army of the Potomac, it devolves upon one so modest as myself to call this meeting to order, and I trust that you will not think that I am premature.

The band, under the leadership of Harvey B. Dodworth, himself a veteran of the war, played the following potpourri, which was frequently interrupted by applause as the familiar Army calls fell upon appreciative ears, and the other selections during the evening:

Music—Yorktown March..... H. B. Dodworth.

Music—Collocation, "The Day in Camp." H. B. Dodworth.

A compilation of Grand Army songs and camp calls, arranged according to the routine of camp life. First we have night, when "The Sentry Walks his Lonely Round," suggested by the airs "All's Well," "Tenting on the Old Camp Ground," and "Oft in the Stilly Night." Then we hear the challenge—the Morning Gun—"Reveille," by fifes and drums and bugles. Camp aroused—"The Battle Cry of Freedom," the "Assembly Call," "Benny Havens, Oh," and "Glory Hallelujah." Breakfast Call—"Peas on a Trencher," "Kingdom Coming." Various Camp Calls—"Tramp, Tramp, Tramp." Mess Call—"Roast Beef," "In the Louisiana Lowlands." Dress Parade and Review, Retreat and Evening Gun—"Marching through Georgia," "Tattoo," "Annie Laurie." Drum tap signal for lights out!

Finale—"When Johnny Comes Marching Home," "Three Cheers for the Red, White and Blue," "Medley" and "To the Color."

Music—Essie Waltz H. C. King.

Music—Cornet Solo (Arban)..... Mr. Jager.

Music—Union Medley..... Arranged by Dodworth.

After music, Rev. Isaac M. Foster, Chaplain in Chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, offered the following prayer :

PRAYER.

Almighty God, we are the creatures of Thy care and the subjects of Thy mercy, and it becometh us at all times to render thanks to Thy great and holy name, and we pause now for a moment to remember Thy mercies to us, and to humble ourselves in Thy presence and offer thanksgiving and praise to Thy great name. We rejoice in the blessings that have come to our land, in the prosperity that has blessed Thy people and the citizens of this great Republic as they have fought to uphold the principles of justice and truth. In the day of darkness Thou didst not forsake us, and in the day of battle Thou wert with us. We remember to-day that the victories won in the past were not in the interest of kingly power or to aggrandize the reign of any, but were in the interest of truth. But, though the day was late that brought us the victory, its dawning came at last, and our flag floated over all the land, and the nations of the earth were impressed with the truth that our country was free, and that our victory was not one of the strong over the weak, but a victory of truth over error.

Guard us in the future, and grant that we may be an example to all nations. Bless these the members of the Society of the Army of the Potomac and the friends here present, and while we bow our heads and remember how many homes were made desolate and hearts sad, we crave Thy blessing upon the widow and orphan; and we who yet remain, whose hearts and arms are strong and full of life, may we not forget what is due to the poor and needy, but rejoice that we are able to extend the hand of sympathy and charity to all. Cement us together, make us one people, and the blessing of God be on us forever. Bless our commander, the President of the Society of the Army of the Potomac, and each and all of us, and when the journey of life is ended, the last battle fought and victory won, grant us that salvation promised us through Christ our Lord. Amen.

General Newton, President of the Society, having meantime arrived, he now introduced Mayor Low, who made the following address of welcome :

ADDRESS OF WELCOME BY MAYOR LOW.

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN OF THE SOCIETY OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC: The people of Brooklyn bid you welcome to their city. For your own sakes, and for the sake of your companions in arms scattered far and wide throughout the land, the sharers with you in the heritage of your illustrious name, and for the sake of those other comrades of yours who, though gone to their long home, still share with you an undying renown, you are thrice welcome. (Applause.)

Four and twenty years ago, gathered upon these hills, a city of 300,000 people heard the echoes of the gun that was trailed upon Fort Sumter, from the impact of whose shot, as it were from the stroke of a magician's wand, the Army of the Potomac sprang into being. (Applause.) To-day a Brooklyn grown to more than twice 300,000 gives you generous welcome. (Applause.) Those who were aged among us then have been gathered to their fathers, lisping with their last breath the prayer that God would preserve in every peril and lead to victory at last the Army of the Potomac. Those who were middle aged then, as they take their grandchildren upon their knees, tell them with fondest repetition of your endurance and your achievements. Those of us who were children then are men and women now, and we stand before you to-night with swelling hearts to assure you of our gratitude, and to tell you of our pride in all you did and were. (Applause.) The houses and the streets of the city are full of those who were then unborn, and these, too, have learned to honor the name of the Army of the Potomac. (Applause.) But their knowledge is of the head, not like ours graven upon the heart. Yet they, no less than we, I trust, give you to-night heartiest greeting. How hard it is as the years go by to preserve with vivid memory the recollections of those warlike days! It is not given to all to recall the incidents of the camp, the fatigues of the march, or the excitement of the battle; but even to those of us who remember only the trumpet and the fife, the recruitings and the farewells, the "extras" and the meetings, the griefs and the rejoicings of those stirring times, I think some influence has come to ennoble life with higher purposes and a loftier patriotism. We can never live as those might live who have only read of what it costs to make a nation free and great, for we know by the seeing of the eye and the hearing of the ear and the instruction of the heart. Brooklyn may say in a certain sense concerning the Army of the Potomac: "All of which I saw and a part of which I was."

From that Brooklyn of 1861, of half our present size, the tramp of gallant feet marching toward the front began upon the instant of the call to arms. The steady march kept on, until 30,000 of our Brooklyn men had taken part in the great struggle. (Applause.) You are our witnesses that they bore themselves gallantly and well. I may not say how large a part of the affections and love of Brooklyn were drawn in those terrible years to the graves and cemeteries of the fields of strife; but enough, God knows, to make the name of the Army of the Potomac not only precious in our ears, but sacred. And so it happens that the city to-day welcomes you at once as brothers and as sons. Part of our life has gone into your life, and the men of Brooklyn, your brothers once in arms, greet you with gladness to-day as brothers in peace. The story of your warlike deeds is written in history. All men know the splendor of your record—how through reverse and disaster you persevered to a success complete and enduring. Gettysburg will remain forever one of the pivotal battles of history. The superb success of Appomattox, not more notable for its victory than for the magnanimous terms granted by your great commander (applause), cemented for all time the bonds of strength and of sympathy which hold together the American Union. Each revolving year shows your achievements not less notable, but greater. The fruitage of the prosperous years since the war, of union and of universal freedom, comes from seeds sown upon the battlefields. No man to-day looking over the United States can fail to rejoice at the issue of the conflict. The imagination falters in trying to conceive the terrible difference had dismemberment succeeded war instead of a stronger Union. I say a stronger Union, because not only have men learned everywhere that the material interests of the nation are one North and South, but out of the strife has come mutual respect for the manhood on each side of the line that could fight so well. The movement of the years is carrying away forever the asperities born of war. Not many weeks since, in this very building, under the leadership of some of your old comrades, a large and earnest audience was gathered to help to raise a fund for the erection of a soldiers' home for those who fought upon the other side. (Applause.) Tell me, gentlemen of the Army of the Potomac, was not that well? We remember now not that they were your foes, but that they are your brothers. And so it came about, I think, that strange and interesting meeting, which has no parallel, so far as I know, upon the records of any nation.

"Peace hath her victories
No less renowned than war."

But this, I think, was only the perfect fruition of your warlike victories, which having conquered force are now overcoming prejudice. And thus the hand of time in myriad ways is showing how worthy even of the greatness of your endeavors and the largeness of the nation's sacrifice are the blessings which have followed in their train.

Gentlemen, we men of Brooklyn delight to call our city a city of homes. Here, in the name of those who went from us and who have helped to contribute to your renown, we trust you will feel at home. With whatever warmth of greeting you may be hailed in other cities, be very sure that nowhere is the Army of the Potomac more revered, more honored and more loved than in this city of Brooklyn. We rejoice that you have come to be our guests. With heartiness and cordiality we will do what we may to make your visit pleasant, and when you return to your own firesides be sure that you take with you, each one of you, the kindest wishes and the most fervent prayers of all our people. (Great applause.)

General Newton responded to the welcome of Mayor Low in the following language:

RESPONSE BY GENERAL NEWTON.

MR. MAYOR: It would, indeed, be ungrateful not to acknowledge and value the cordial greeting of the Society by you and the citizens of Brooklyn, and it would show a dulness of comprehension past belief not to appreciate the brilliant reception with which we have been honored. The memory of this day will be fresh in the hearts of the veterans of the Army of the Potomac so long as one survives of those now present. We honor you for the generous sentiments you have expressed toward our former adversaries. No bitterness springing from past contention has ever found a place in the spirit which founded this Society. To cherish the memories and associations of the Army of the Potomac, to strengthen the ties of fraternal friendship, to perpetuate the name and fame of comrades who have fallen in battle or died in the path of duty, martyrs to principle, these are the objects of our institution. It seems to me that no people have ever developed into greatness without previous intestine commotions and sanguinary civil wars, and we could not hope to escape the consequences which follow necessarily when strong men take opposite sides, believing that honor and justice alike demand the maintenance unto death of the part they espouse. Our civil war was but one of these epochs in the history of this nation, and in spite of the evils of war it is impossible not to feel proud, as Americans, of the heroism and self-devotion developed by both sides in that momentous and gigantic struggle; and there is no reason that we should not extend both sympathy and individual help to the victims of war among our late enemies.

Your allusion to the fact that Brooklyn is a city of homes reminds me that until recently it was my home, and that even now I am very much at home here. When on my way to attend this gathering my line of travel approached the sea coast, and, for brief moments, I caught the perfume of the sea and inhaled the balmy and refreshing breezes of old ocean, I was led to reflect upon the wisdom of selecting this sea-girt city for our Re-union in preference to an inland town, or even to our sultry neighbor over the river, and was moved in spirit to propose a vote of thanks to the individual who first suggested the idea. (Applause.)

THE PRESIDENT :

COMRADES : I crave your attention for a few minutes while the Secretary reads a few communications.

The Secretary then read the following telegram :

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 11, 1884.

General HORATIO C. KING,

115 Broadway, New York.

The President greatly regrets that his official engagements will prevent his presence at the annual Re-union of the Society of the Potomac on the 11th and 12th instants. He appreciates the courtesy of the invitation, and desires to express his best wishes for the success of the meeting.

FRED J. PHILLIPS,
Private Secretary.

The Secretary also read the following resolution, which was received with applause, and unanimously adopted :

Resolved, That the thanks of the members of the Society of the Army of the Potomac are most cordially tendered to the Mayor and Civic Authorities and the citizens generally, to the Military of Brooklyn, the Posts of the Grand Army of the Republic, the Visiting Organizations, and all who have given the Society a welcome that can never be forgotten.

The resolution was carried unanimously by a rising vote.

General NEWTON then said :

COMRADES: I have the pleasure of introducing to you Hon. John Savage, the poet of the evening, who is well known to us all as the author of that stirring poem in 1861, "The Rising of the North." (Applause.)

THE POEM.

BY HON. JOHN SAVAGE.

I.

I, who in the war's wild tumult
More than twenty years ago,
Sang the Muster of the North-men
Who for union struck a blow—
I, who shared the sacred fervor
And the destiny it willed,
And saw friends and comrades slaughtered
That their faith might be fulfilled—

I, who sang the wrathful mission that we never more may see,
Hail—the Army of Potomac! Sing—the veterans of the free!

II.

Ah, how memory with its magic
And its miseries brings up
The people's agony of love
When forced to quaff the cup—
The bitter cup that held the life
Eternal of the free;
For the wreck of man's Republic
Chained the millions yet to be,

And they who left love, comfort, home, the sacrifice to share,
Were martyrs, tho' they died not, to man's future ev'rywhere.

III.

Ah! Peace be with those terror-days
Those days of wrath and splendor
That tore apart with wolfish greed—
And bound with love more tender!
God's mercy with the hate that strove
Our means and ends to sever—
God's glory with returning love
That binds us now—forever!

The South should bend in chivalry to bless the North that freed it,
And both in brotherhood proclaim strife ended as both needed.

IV.

We must not taunt, or preach or vaunt,
O'er themes where passions dwelt:—
We glorify the dead who died
For what they living felt.
Our brothers err'd—but chidings pass
While firmer friendship grows—
What though "opinion" made us foes?—
They were immortal foes!

The measures of whose greatness, and the height of whose renown,
Is the blood-emblazoned vastness of the force to put them down.

V.

Time passes, and in judgment broods
 O'er hard fought, bloody fields,
 And rival ghosts of gallantry
 Rise, claiming battered shields;
 On which, though rust and dint and crash,
 No blotched escutcheon dwells,
 But chevroned by the cleaving gash,
 Of death-bought conflict tells.

Time's captured less by faction than by hero-bred persistence,
 And ages crown the victors by the victim's grand resistance.

VI.

While yet the stern, embattled hosts
 Were facing North or South,
 To glut with sacrificial pomp
 War's fierce, insatiate drouth,
 And armies rose and fought and fell,
 And armies took their place;
 To prove that human life's a trust
 To save the human race;

The Old World, with the shriveled soul that glory meanly robs,
 In mocking malice stigmatized our hosts as "armed mobs."

VII.

The wish was father to the phrase
 And sped the sneering tones;
 In democratic strength they feel
 The tottering of thrones;
 They fear the soul-awakening throb
 Success gives struggling braves
 As Freedom's failure's hailed by them
 To prove men should be slaves.

But the ignorance they fostered now affrights its native gloom
 And the people's education is the people's master's doom.

VIII.

The poet's heart's for peace and love,
 And all the joy that comes
 From glorious mornings on the hills—
 Eve's toil-rewarding homes—
 From happy commune with the woods,
 The cascades, brooks, and dells,
 And Nature's bless'd resources where
 Bright health and beauty dwells:—

But if sweet peace should change to strife—he'd wail in song the snobs
 Of monarchy, if they should meet in war such armed mobs!

IX.

But let them prop—a little while—
 Their hopes from fawning shelves;
Our birthright is a continent,
 Our rulers are ourselves;
 God gives us brains, and teeming plains,
 And arms to guard His plan;
 Our citizens are soldiers,
 And each soldier is a man!

And while grim monarchs steal to sleep in fortified, mined pavilions,
 Our sovereigns rest or roam at peace—armed mobs of fifty millions.

X.

Gallant Army of Potomac!
Veteran braves, behold your prize!
A world of verdurous wonder,
All climes within your skies;
From the commerce-keel'd Atlantic
To Pacific's siren smiles;
From northern lakes, whence morning breaks
To deck the Thousand Isles,
To the gorgeous Gulf of Mexico, where sky and ocean kiss,
And the gold and purple twilight seems God's reverie of bliss.

XI.

While streams are hated boundaries
Of customs, language, laws,
In other lands, our rivers laugh
Between both banks' applause.
The cloud-seducing mountains bear
Heav'n's gifts to earth with pride,
Till sun and shade, alternate bless,
Slopes, streams at either side.
One language, law; one coin, one cause o'er every field and tide!
What naught but seas and skies embrace, no hills or streams divide.

XII.

Engines frothen all our rivers,
Cloud the vales, and circle hills,
Like tremendous shuttles weaving
Love and strength from tireless wills
Leaving freedom's guard behind them,
Meeting freedom's gods before,
Weaving brighter, grander, stronger
The one flag that floats all o'er!
And within the mighty realm of States, no tongue or tribute bars;
Our frontiers are the Heavens, and our sentinels the stars.

XIII.

Ye are named, historic heroes,
From the river of renown,
Upon whose banks the millions' thanks
Are hourly pouring down.
Ye are children of the valor
Of the Father sleeping there;
Ye are guardians of his wisdom—
Of his pen and sword the heir!
And while Potomac's melody sings through its rocks and meads,
Its shores will echo history's proud record of your deeds.

XIV.

Then glory to the chiefs who led
And honored the command!
And glory to the rank and file,
The safety of the land!
And glory to the rights we've saved!
And triple glory give
To those who lived to nobly die,
Or died to nobly live!
And glory to the matrons who bare like sons to be
The bulwarks of their fathers' fame, the Veterans of the free

During its recital many of the sentiments of the poem drew forth bursts of applause, and at its close the poet was loudly cheered.

General Newton then introduced General Horace Porter, the orator of the occasion, who was received with great applause.

THE ORATION.

BY GENERAL HORACE PORTER.

When the Italian fisherman puts out to sea, it is his custom to offer up a prayer for strength because his bark is so small and the sea is so vast; and when I reflect upon the magnitude of the task assigned me to-night, I feel like putting in a plea for strength because the subject is so vast, and my ideas are so few. If I should attempt to touch upon a tithe of the topics which should be mentioned in connection with the history of the Army of the Potomac, I should detain you until the rising of another sun, and you would be called upon to exercise what Napoleon considered the highest quality in soldiers—"two o'clock in the morning courage;" and before I had proceeded far my remarks would become so scattering that I fear you would be inclined to liken the tenor of my discourse to those familiar old Chickahominy swamps—only knee deep, but spread out over all creation. (Laughter.)

If I had known earlier than I did know that the Army of the Potomac was going to make such an attack as this upon me to-night, I should have endeavored to beat a hasty retreat and abandon the ground to some one else. I think I should have succeeded, for if there is one lesson which the war taught better than another, it is that a man may retreat successfully from almost any position, if he only starts in time. (Laughter.)

I feel that the first duty of one who attempts to speak to you to-night is to extend our most grateful acknowledgments for the cordial welcome extended to us to-day by the people of this goodly city. We came as travellers come. They vied with each other in "pressing the cup of greeting to our lips ere we had thrust travel from our garb."

We have had the honor of being welcomed by a committee of Brooklyn's chief citizens, whose numbers seem equalled only by the numbers of our own society. I fear this body of chief citizens in coming forth to meet us to-day felt somewhat like that deputation of the chief citizens of Rome who once came out to her outer walls to expostulate with the hosts of an invading army.

We have also had the distinction of being received by his Honor, the Mayor of this great city. I am sure you appreciate this, for in his official capacity he has been engaged in successfully solving a more perplexing question than was ever presented for solution to the Army of the Potomac—the vexed question of how to govern a great city. I have never heard but one fault attributed to him, and that is a fault which will never be laid at the door of any member of this society—the fault of being young. (Laughter.) But we are encouraged to believe that he will overcome even this if they will only give him time enough.

This army has long wanted to meet in Brooklyn, but it is an army which, forgetful of its former practice, no longer marches with its pontoon train, and, therefore, it had to await the completion of the Brooklyn bridge. (Renewed laughter.) To the members of this society the past is beginning to seem like a dream long since dreamt. It is a score of years since the Army of the Potomac stood shoulder to shoulder in line of battle in front of Petersburg and Richmond. It is well nigh a quarter of a century since that army first gathered in its might, rallied to the defence of an imperilled nation, knelt upon this soil to swear allegiance to the Republic, and sealed the oath with its blood. (Applause.) Time is passing and memory is fading. Republics, if they be not ungrateful, are at least forgetful, and it is well that the survivors of that great struggle should gather together each year, should once more assemble around the bivouac, should light again the historic camp fires, to the end that in their light the world may read anew the record of the imperishable deeds of the Army of the Potomac. Should America be less mindful of her heroes than ancient Greece or modern Europe? It is said that for ages after the battle of Thermopylæ, every school child in Greece was required to rise in his place each morning, and recite from memory the names of the three hundred immortal heroes who held that mountain pass. Latour d'Auvergne, a private in the French army, had covered himself with glory in a hundred battles, and had been given the proudest title a French soldier can receive, that of the "First Grenadier of France." When he fell, pierced with the enemy's bullets, and scarred with honorable wounds, a general order directed that thereafter his name should be kept on the active roll, should be called at every roll call, and a private in the ranks should answer for him; and at every reveille, and at every tattoo, the sergeant called "Latour d'Auvergne," and a private answered from the ranks, "Died on the field of honor." And so, if the muster roll of the old Army of the Potomac were spread out here to-night and seen as you once saw it, if the familiar names were called over as you once heard them called, each man here could rise in his place and answer not for one comrade, but for tens of thousands of comrades, "Died on the field of honor." It is nearly a quarter of a century since the first gun was fired on Sumter. It was not a loud report; that gun did but little damage to the fort, but it was the most significant shot ever fired from cannon's mouth. Its sound awoke a sleeping North, its echoes aroused to the frenzy of war a peaceful people; its reverberations did not cease till they had reached to foreign shores, and told the whole world that the Great Republic was at war. Then every man, woman, and child in the land became a worker in the cause which moved the nation's soul. Men went to enlisting, officers to organizing, preachers to joining Christian commissions, the noble men and women of the land to forming sanitary commissions, and little children dropped their school-books and went to scraping lint and cutting bandages. There was foreshadowed what history afterward verified, that the true hero of that war was the American people! What! said some, will brothers fight? Aye, said our people, even brothers will fight when their mothers have been struck. (Applause.)

Our people were a peaceful people, a Scripture-reading people. They did not want to let the sun to go down upon their wrath, but they could not help wishing that they lived at that point near the pole where the sun doesn't go down for six months at a time, and gives righteous wrath a fair chance. (Laughter.)

Then came the mighty gathering of that vast army. The doors of the workshops were closed, the fields were deserted. Armed men poured down from the hilltops and surged up from the valleys, the middle wall of partition was broken down between classes, until it seemed like the good days of old, when "none were for a party, but all were for the State." The whole land became one vast military camp, and man felt that he lived again in the heroic ages.

Soon there came the order to break up the camps of instruction and move that army to the front. Then every hamlet bristled with marching men. Every street was lighted by the glitter of their steel. The drums were sounding the march, fifes were playing "The girl I left behind me." Many a cheek in those ranks soon to become bronzed by Southern suns, and begrimed with powder, was now bathed in the tears of parting. Aged parents stood bowed, stricken in the grief of separation, and sweethearts watched the fading columns until the great, blinding tears shut out the sight. And so, with drums beating, flags flying, kerchiefs waving, hands kissing, voices cheering, the representatives of America's manhood marched away on their wild campaign. (Great applause.) That army contained the flower of the flock. Every man that came down in those days came with a pocket in his shirt, hair close cropped, clean shaved, fresh vaccinated, musket on his shoulder, ready to do anything that duty might call for, from squirrel hunting up to manslaughter in the first degree. (Laughter and applause.)

Each man felt in his strength that with a single rush he could carry away a whole span of barbed wire fence without scratching himself. (Laughter.) A soldier of the Army of the Potomac! Why, if he were lame, he made it an excuse for disobeying an order to retreat. If he were too short-sighted to see the enemy, he would go nearer; if he had but one stocking, he would take it off his foot in wet weather and wrap it around the lock of his gun. And as for clothing, he would keep on the march as long as he had clothes enough on his back to wad a gun with. They had brass bands there—amateur brass bands; everything in those days was headed by a brass band. (Laughter.) The tunes they played—well, you remember those tunes; they were considered capital tunes for rallying men going into a fight. After hearing one of those tunes played entirely through, it made almost any man feel as if he wanted to die. (Laughter.) We thought we were a peaceful people, but now we found we were a very military people, particularly when we reflected that in case of war we could furnish an army for each side, and if necessary furnish the war itself. (Laughter.)

That army in a moment of courageous gayety made its trial trip in that somewhat complicated series of retrograde movements known as Bull Run. The men never acknowledged a retreat, but in their more candid moments they did own up to falling back about twenty miles. They were told that the eyes of Washington were upon them, and they, as a matter of reciprocal courtesy, wanted to get their eyes on Washington. Many a gun trembled so in the hands of its holder on each side that day that if an enemy got to dodging he was pretty sure to be hit. When that army reached the Potomac that night, its different subdivisions looked as if they had been issued in penny numbers and not yet bound. (Laughter.) Well, retreats may have followed in after years, but that was the last rout. (Applause.) When that army moved into Virginia again, it went there to stay. For four long years it was found either standing up as a great wall of China between Washington and Richmond, or passing with the swiftness of a weaver's shuttle between the two capitals. What with trying to keep one eye on Richmond and the other on Washington, the great wonder is that every man in that army did not become as cross-eyed as the boy who spent his time watching trains passing each other on a railway. (Great laughter.) The trials of that army have not been matched since the trade of war began. Its sufferings have not been equalled since the days of the Christian martyrs. For a time victory ceased to perch upon its banners, the coffers in the treasury were drained, thousands of comrades who had recently been giving a true comrade's touch of the elbow in the ranks were languishing in Southern prison pens. News from home meant poverty in the family, news from the front meant defeat, news from the rear meant mob rule and draft riots in the streets. Hope seemed to fade and courage to fail. The land was filled with doubting Thomases, unbelieving Saracens, discontented Catalines. But as the Danes once destroyed the hearing of their war horses in order that they might not be affrighted by the din of battle, so the men of the Army of the Potomac turned a deaf ear to the doubts and despondencies in the rear, and pushed boldly to the front. (Great applause.)

But in that front what scenes were met! There was the blistering southern sun, swamps which bred miasma and death, rivers with impossible approaches, batteries to be captured, heights to be seized. There was the open plain, with batteries in front and batteries in flank, which swept the columns till human blood flowed as freely as festal wine. There were the dense woods, the undergrowth barring the passage of man, the uppergrowth shutting out the light of heaven; by-paths and roadways, all in the hands of the enemy; men shot down by unseen foes, forest fires raging, ammunition trains exploding, the dead roasted in the flames, the wounded dragging their mangled limbs after them to escape the ravages, until every thorn on every bush was hung with blood-stained clothing, until it seemed that men had turned to fiends and hell itself had usurped the place of earth. (Applause.)

Many here will remember an instance of desperate courage which ought to become historic. They will remember the soldiers who sat down at night before another desperate charge had been ordered at Cold Harbor, took pieces of paper, wrote on them their names, and then pinned the papers on the backs of their coats, so that their friends might recognize their dead bodies when found on the field after the battle. That was an instance of desperate, devoted, sublime courage.

That army never paused till it had fulfilled the hopes of those who marshalled it ; it never hesitated till it wrested victory from defeat. I shall not attempt to recite the history of that army. It is indelibly engraved on your memories, eternally embalmed in your hearts. It was an army which for four long years was the sword and shield of the great Republic. For four long years it held in its grasp not only the destinies of this land, but the fate of liberty and of good government throughout the world. (Applause.) It was an army which had for its objective point, never a city, but always an opposing army. It was an army which fought over more miles of ground than most armies of the world had ever marched over. It was an army which had as many different commanders as it fought separate campaigns ; and while it cherished those natural affections which it ought to cherish for its trusted leaders, yet it marched as patiently and fought as gallantly under the new chief as the old. It was an army baptized in blood, consecrated in tears, hallowed in prayers. An army whose memory will remain green in the hearts of men as long as manly courage is talked of or heroic deeds are honored. (Applause.) That army never faltered till it attained the goal of its ambition. It never wavered till it reached its hour of crowning triumph, and fired its last shot on the hill tops of Appomattox. You who stood upon those heights that day, flushed with the pride of success, when you gather together in the after years as you gather here to-night, seem never to grow weary of gazing once more upon the familiar faces of the heroic men who led you, of listening to the voices you once so willingly obeyed, not forgetting that great chief who, while commanding all the armies of the Republic, chose to cast his lot with the Army of the Potomac, and on Appomattox day led it to final and triumphant victory. (Applause.) I know you honor as you should honor every commander of that army, the living and the dead, from him who sowed the first sound seeds of discipline which led to after triumphs to him who held command when the bugles sounded the notes of final victory. (Applause.) Heroes all ! who fairly won their spurs. No man can lessen the measure of their fame; no one can pluck the laurel from their brows. (Applause.) It was now the 9th of April. The last gun had been fired, the charges were withdrawn from the cannon, the tents were struck, the standards were tenderly folded—those standards, battle stained, bullet riddled, many a one a mere remnant of its former self, with not enough left of it on which to imprint the names of the battles it had seen. The camp fires were left to smoulder in their embers, and for the first time in four years the soldiers of the Army of the Potomac turned their backs upon the soldiers of the Army of Northern Virginia. (Applause.)

It has been well said that the calm before the storm is a peace of man's making; but the calm after a storm is a peace of God's making. It was now a calm after the storm. I shall not refer to the causes of that war. It was a war which men entered reluctantly and left gladly; entered it in the spirit of Shakespeare's soldier, who said:

“Cheerily on, courageous friends, that we may reap a harvest of perpetual peace
From this one bloody act of sharp war.”

It was easy to forgive—it was hard to forget; but the soldier element on both sides was the first to forget the rancor, the partizan bitterness, of the struggle. And let us trust, let us believe, that when trouble next beclouds the nation's brow, her sons of the North and of the South, forgetting their past differences, may be found standing as stood the men in the Roman phalanx of old—shoulder to shoulder, their shields locked together against a common foe. (Applause.)

I should consider that injustice had been done to the great subject uppermost in our minds to-night, if I did not, in closing, allude to some of the great lessons of the war.

In the first place, it taught our people charity, charity in its broadest, noblest sense; it taught men how much easier it is to criticise than to command, and that the more conspicuous the actor, the more is he a target for the shafts of envy. Who ever heard of a man who had been skulking under a baggage wagon or drinking beer in the sutler's tent during a fight criticised for his conduct at the front? He was not there to be criticised. It only shows that in the military service, as in all the walks of life, it is only the shirks, the do-nothings, the milk-sops, who pass through their entire career undecorated by the hand of censure, and that the philosopher was right who said: "Reproach is a concomitant to greatness, as satire and invective were an essential part of a Roman triumph."

That war taught us a new lesson in the love of country. Bolingbroke has said that even patriotism must be taught: that it is not an institution of nature, but a lesson of reason. The value of a country can only be measured by the cost of saving it.

Again, that war taught all men a new lesson in reverence for the flag of their country. It taught them that that banner was to be to them like the banner in the sky which appeared to Constantine of old and turned him back to the path of duty. They were taught that that flag was to be their pillar of cloud by day, their pillar of fire by night. They were educated to reverence it, trained to salute it; taught that it was to wave above them in victory, be their rallying point in defeat; and, if they offered up their lives a sacrifice in its defence, its gentle folds would rest upon their bosoms in death, its crimson stripes mingle with their generous hearts' blood; its very presence there upon their bodies, confined or unconfined, would write a more enduring epitaph than that on the sarcophagus in which the great Sesostri meant to sleep.

The great lessons of the war are ever present with us.

The record of its battles has passed into history, and the scroll on which that history is written has been securely lodged in the highest niche of the temple of Fame.

Long continued applause followed the close of General PORTER'S speech.

In response to loud calls, General SLOCUM, rising, spoke as follows :

REMARKS OF GENERAL SLOCUM.

COMRADES: I thank you for your cordial greeting, and am going to content myself with that. I know very well that you feel every word that was said by General Newton in response to the Mayor's address about your welcome here to-day. You feel, I think, like obliging the citizens of Brooklyn, and if you do, you will ask some one besides your own neighbors to speak to you. There are on this stage a dozen different gentlemen not residents of this city whom you would be glad to listen to, and I know you will oblige me by calling for one of them. I will ask for Major Maginnis, the orator of last year. (Applause.)

REMARKS OF MAJOR MAGINNIS.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: I did not expect General Slocum to place me in this predicament, but the first speech I ever made to an audience in my life I made to a Brooklyn audience. My regiment was badly cut up at Gettysburg, and when they came on to recuperate they camped us over here in Brooklyn for four weeks on old Fort Greene. They treated us with a hospitality that I shall never forget, and I thought to-day, when I saw them marching through the streets here, with what a different feeling they looked upon them. When the tattered and shot-torn banners were carried then through the streets, we had to put a guard around them to keep the ladies from rushing in and carrying them away. I am glad to meet here the Army of the Potomac, the first to rush to the defence of our country. We are here, but we left many of our comrades behind us. The stream after which our society is named was ensanguined with their blood. On the way to Atlanta, at Gettysburg, and other famed places, we left them in their glory. (Applause.) But we can well afford to forgive those who fought against us, and to help them now. When we came home from the war we came in triumph; and how must they have felt who went home after four years' trial against the strength of their Government, defeated and with banners trailing in the dust? We congratulate ourselves upon the way in which the great Northern Army has melted into the great body of the people again, but more credit still is due to those who went home from the war defeated; for they have become the best citizens, the most loyal citizens, in the South. That was a war of great enterprises and achievements, fought with a bravery that never was surpassed and a chivalry that never yet was equalled. But its fields of sorrow stained with the blood of our countrymen, North and South, are wailing places, where the cheeks of the Southern maiden and the Northern matron need not blush for either; and we may be sure now that if a foreign war were to come upon us, our Southern brethren would stand shoulder to shoulder with us in defence of the Union forever. (Great applause.)

General DOUBLEDAY was next called upon, and responded as follows:

REMARKS OF GENERAL DOUBLEDAY.

The story of Fort Sumter is very old. It was a very small affair compared with other great battles, but it was of the greatest importance at that time. At that period the nation seemed undecided whether to support us or not. We felt for a while like orphan children. I shall never forget the welcome we received upon coming to this city. It was my fortune to aid at the firing of the first gun of the war fired on the side of the Union, but if I could only have foreseen at that time the glorious welcome we have had to-day, it would have done much to soothe the anxiety I felt then. I thank you for this kindly reception you have given me. (Applause.)

Corporal TANNER being called upon, replied as follows:

REMARKS OF CORPORAL TANNER.

GENTLEMEN: This is emphatically not my night for making a speech or an apology for one. I have been endeavoring as a citizen of Brooklyn to make your visit here pleasant, and whether I have succeeded or not you will find out to-morrow on the boat. We are very glad to have you among us. We hope you will carry away pleasant recollections, and that the Army of the Potomac will last many years to come. (Applause.)

The meeting then adjourned amid the martial strains of the band.

THE EXCURSION.

Preparations had been made for three thousand excursionists, but the foggy, unpropitious weather reduced the number to about two thousand, who embarked on the steamer Grand Republic at 10 A. M. The arrangements, under the supervision of the efficient committee of which Corporal James Tanner was chairman, were most excellent, including a good and sufficient lunch. The band, with Mr. Dodworth as leader, supplied spirited and appropriate music. The sail was down the bay to the starting point of the yacht race, but the race being interrupted by the thick weather, the boat was headed toward the Palisades. The day was given up to rest and enjoyment, and no proceedings of a formal character were had.

The Eagle notes the following incident:

“Just before the boat returned to Brooklyn prior to sailing to Bay Ridge, the band struck up the ‘Essie Waltz,’ which was heard the night before at the Academy of Music. It was enthusiastically received, and the author, General Horatio C. King, was loudly called for. The gentleman, who happened to be near at the time and unable to beat a retreat, modestly asked to be excused, but finally was compelled to make a few remarks, in which he thanked his friends for their kindly recognition of his work, and closed by calling upon Mayor Low, to whom he said were due in the largest degree the success of the Re-union and the handsome reception given the Society by the city of Brooklyn.

“Three rousing cheers were given for Mayor Low, who, standing upon a seat, said: ‘I am about as much surprised at being called upon for a speech at this time as Becky Jones was when she was called upon to testify. I hope you will not send me to Ludlow Street Jail. We are glad that you have been the guests of our city. There is not a man, woman or child in Brooklyn who does not feel better that you have been there, and all have in their hearts warm affection for you. I wish I could boast of martial deeds. I am reminded that my services are like those of the captain who was continually boasting of his exploits, until, asked for particulars, he said the only time he ever drew a sword was in a raffle. I have not drawn a sword in that way, but I have served my country at a soda water fountain at the Sanitary Fair. (Applause.) I found out what syrups I liked best, and have been a soda water man ever since. I thank you for the good will you have shown toward me and thus to our city, and I can only say, come again, and we will welcome you more heartily than we do now.' (Applause.)

"Three cheers were then given for the city of Brooklyn. At half past three o'clock the Grand Republic stopped at Jewell's Wharf, where some of the party landed, and the remainder, who were to attend the banquet, went to Bay Ridge and then took a special train to the Island. A number of the company attended the races at Sheepshead Bay, which by courtesy of the Coney Island Club were made free to the members, the rest proceeding to Coney Island, where three hours were pleasantly passed until the hour for the banquet."

THE BANQUET.

The Banquet was held at the Oriental Hotel. The great dining hall was brilliantly decorated with portraits of distinguished officers, flags, banners and other patriotic emblems. Nearly eight hundred citizens and ex-soldiers were present. At the chief table were seated General Newton, Mayor Low, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, General George B. McClellan, General Calvin E. Pratt, General Horace Porter, Hon. John Savage, General H. W. Slocum, General Abner Doubleday, Andrew McLean, Esq., General Joshua L. Chamberlain, General John G. Farnsworth and General James A. Beaver.

At each plate was a very handsome menu card, representing in one view the soldiers around the camp kettles enjoying their repast of beans, and in another the veterans at the festive board with a French cook firing at them from a mortar all the delicacies of the season. An embossed and illuminated copy of the Society badge completed the picturesque design.

After the discussion of an excellent bill of fare, General NEWTON suspended the attack and said :

COMRADES : The first regular toast is "The President of the United States," to be drunk standing.

In response all the banquetters arose, and with brimming glasses drank the President's health, and loudly applauded the toast.

THE PRESIDENT :

COMRADES : A slight change will be made in the order of exercises, and the Rev. Mr. BEECHER will respond to the toast, "The Army of the Potomac." (Applause.)

ADDRESS OF REV. H. W. BEECHER.

Being in the military service, I am obliged to obey the orders of my superior, and therefore rise to speak, though called up out of my turn and less prepared than I would have been if I had been allowed to finish my coffee. By what I have seen of you to-night I am satisfied that if the Army of the Potomac fought as well as it has eaten to-night it must have been invincible. (Laughter and cheers.) I remember very well when as yet none of you who are sitting before me now were (laughter and applause); when those who are now before me, wearing the laurels they won in half a hundred fights, were beginning their education in soldiering—for you were all mere boys in '61, and although some of your officers graduated at West Point, they all went to school again in the field (cheers) and learned the things that made you successful by the resistance and the defence and the mocking that met you at every step in the great contest. The fact was that the North at the beginning of the struggle only believed in the cause for which it was fighting as men believe in sermons—on Sundays. (Laughter.) On the other hand, the South was in deadly earnest. The North expected a short war, and for the first year it was not successful, but it learned. The South was one of the most defensible countries in the world, and it had a brave people and generals educated at the same schools as our own were; and at every step in that conflict we were met by the most skilful of leaders and the bravest of men, and we had got to learn. It was not until the second year of the war that the North became thoroughly imbued with the idea that the cause it had adopted required and deserved the utmost self-sacrifice. On the other hand, whenever the South attempted to carry the war into the North it was checked, and retired routed and unsuccessful at all points. Witness Gettysburg and Antietam. In the first half of the war we were preparing, and at the end of the war we may say, without invidious detraction from the Army of the Cumberland and the Army of the Tennessee, that the Army of the Potomac had given the world a new term. Its battles, its defeats, its skill, and its want of skill form a school at which the armies of nations learn. It is my purpose to make to-night a brief mention of some few points which I think profoundly interesting, but which are generally overlooked on occasions of this kind. In the first place, we all know that it is the custom to bewail the dead, the glorious dead, who fell in the defence of their country. (Cheers.) Why, they died in a good cause, and when they were dying they died. (Laughter.) They were the lucky ones. But there were many others who came back maimed and wounded and unable to work. They came back to sit down discouraged, disabled, neglected. It was better to have died than to have met that fate. (Applause.) We have forgotten the soldier largely. I remember the day when we honored every man who ever had worn the Union uniform, but we have largely forgotten them now. (Applause.) We find them seeking lowly clerkships. My heart goes out to them. (Cheers and applause.) Again, there are the surgeons. (Laughter.) I know some of you are angry because they did not take off one of your arms or legs. (Laughter.) Another class which has been neglected is the chaplains of the army. (Laughter.) There was here and there a good one.

There were some who laid down their lives in their country's cause. (Cheers.) Their case, too, was particularly hard, for they were compelled to bear all the dangers of the fight without being allowed to do any of the fighting. (Cheers.) Another class was that large band of women which went out with the army. (Loud and prolonged cheers.) Whenever I have heard it contended that women by mixing with rude men lost that modesty and refinement which is their chief charm, I have thought of those women who went with the soldiers through all their campaigns and came out with more honor than they bore when they went in. I tell you, comrades, the time of danger brings out the stuff that is in the men of this country, and we find it in our army. An Englishman of note said while the war was in progress, "If your army subdues this rebellion, no nation on earth will dare to attack you." Well, we did subdue the rebellion, and the Englishman spoke truly when he said that we need fear no people on earth. I hear now and then some talk about the Monroe doctrine—the Monroe nonsense. The idea that the Panama Canal or anything else can draw upon us a foreign invasion is ridiculous. I care no more for the bombs of the foreign incendiaries than I do for thistledown. (Cheers.)

Another thing that strikes me forcibly in overlooking the time of our war and its immediate subsequent period is the disappearance of the Northern army. The most radical of the peace advocates cannot say that the soldiers of that army disturbed the peace of a single village after the close of the war. Every soldier—disappointing the predictions of those who considered a republican army only as an armed mob—remembered that he was a citizen, and every general and officer was more a citizen than he was an officer. You have seen the snow lying thick on the ground in the early Spring time. You don't go to work with shovel and barrow to clear it away. You just leave it alone, and presently the sun comes out and the snow melts, and each separate flake runs away in moisture to the root of some plant or tree and carries out faithfully its part in the great plan of nature. So it was with our armies. (Cheers and applause.) Gentlemen, I know you are aching to hear from Mayor Low. ("No, no, go on." Laughter and applause.) Yes, it is very easy to say go on. (A voice: "The chaplain first.") You remember the story of the old deacon who used to criticise his pastor's sermons and say that he could preach better, and how he was put in the pulpit by the pastor, and how he began: "Beloved brethren—beloved brethren—beloved brethren—ahem," and then noticing the boys laughing at him he continued, "well, if you can do better than this, you had better come up here and try yourselves." (Laughter and much pounding of tables.) Let me only say, not to prolong these remarks, that it is a matter of great pleasure for the citizens of Brooklyn that they have been able to see you and hear you. (Laughter and applause.) I had not the opportunity of seeing you during the charge, but I think, judging from your performances this evening, that you must have been a body of men who never flinched. Even the artillery in front of you now does not seem to daunt you. The citizens of Brooklyn are glad to see you. We have a King in Brooklyn (laughter); unfortunately he is a Democratic King. (Laughter.) Well, I am afraid there will be many more Democrats in Brooklyn after the next election. (Cheers, laughter, and a scene of great excitement; voices: "No politics.") All politics out of order, gentlemen. (Laughter.) Well, to this King you owe much for the success of this reception. When you go away from Brooklyn, I hope you will carry with you much matter for serious reflection. (Laughter.) I thank you for your silence and attention. (Cheers, laughter, and loud, prolonged applause.)

THE PRESIDENT:

GENTLEMEN: The next regular toast is "The State of New York." General SLOCUM will respond. (Applause.)

ADDRESS OF GENERAL SLOCUM.

COMRADES OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC: The fact that the first toast on your printed list here is given in honor of the State of New York may lead some to conclude that on the Committee of Arrangements there was a New Yorker who believed that the Army of the Potomac was a New York organization. I wish in behalf of my State that I could say that New York did contribute the great majority of the soldiers to that army. I wish that we could claim the gentlemen on my left and on my right. But the Army of the Potomac was not a New York army. It was not even an Eastern army. The Army of the Potomac was composed of men from the East and West. Every one of you here assembled knows perfectly well that among the regiments that composed that army some of the bravest, the best and truest men were from the far distant West. (Applause.) Our State—the State of New York—I am not going to boast of New York, but I say the State of New York furnished during the war more soldiers for the army—yes, double the number of soldiers that were ever in the Army of the Potomac at any one time. Of the 2,600,000 men that were called into the service by Abraham Lincoln (applause), the great State of New York furnished 488,000. (Applause.) This is from the records of the War Department. I confess that I was surprised yesterday when our honored Mayor told us that the city of Brooklyn, which then had but between two and three hundred thousand population, furnished to the quota of New York

30,000 men. (Applause.) I think you will all grant to me that I have a right to feel proud not only of the city in which I reside, but of my native State.

But the number of men furnished to the general government by New York was but a small measure of what she did. After Fort Sumter was fired upon, the great meeting held across the river, which inspired the people throughout this broad land, was due to New York influence. At the darkest hours during the war it was the spirit of the New York people, inspired by the press and permeating all through our land, which enkindled and aroused the spirit of the people and gave them life. Of all the millions, the tens, the hundreds and thousands of millions of dollars, borrowed by our government, more than three-quarters of it was borrowed through New York capitalists. Every man who knows what war is, knows that the banker is to the Treasury what the cannon factory and armory are to the War Department. No great war can be carried on without funds, and I say here now that while I have always felt proud of the actions of my native State during the war, of the number of men she sent to the field and of their conduct on the battle field, I have always had a still prouder feeling for her conduct in respect to our financial affairs.

From the commencement of the war up to the present day, neither of the two great political parties into which our people are divided in this State has ever proposed anything even suggestive of repudiation, nor anything looking toward a measure which would bring reproach upon our people or cause a shade of doubt in the world at large of her financial integrity. I feel more proud of that fact than I do of our prowess on the battle field. This great State after the close of the war, I think was about the only one which established a home for its soldiers. (Applause.). Through the influence of the gentleman who has just preceded me and of others in this hall, the State of New York, notwithstanding that the general government had provided in a measure for decrepit soldiers of the war, took her own soldiers and furnished a home for them; and most generously has she provided for that home from that day to this.

There never has been a request made by the managers of the Home that has not been freely and quickly granted by the authorities of this State. I believe New York is the only State in this Union that ever established, that ever constructed, a great public work and threw it open for public use. The State built the Erie Canal at an expense of $50,000,000. To-day it is entirely free to commerce. A distinguished member of Congress from Illinois said on the floor of Congress last week that in his judgment his State had derived more benefit from this public work than our own

State ; and he was right. New York has been first and foremost in all these great enterprises, and it will continue to be so. Our State asks nothing to-day of the general government which it has not a right to ask for its own benefit, and for that which will be a benefit to all our country. It has a right to ask of the general government, with its overflowing Treasury, that it should put our State in a position for defence against the sea at least equal with the fourth-class powers of Europe. New York has a right to demand of the general government that it shall at least make itself competent to cope with so weak a power as Chili. To-day we are not its equal. The great State of New York has a right to demand, not only in behalf of itself, but in behalf of all the Western States, that the harbor of this metropolis shall be properly defended. My friend on the right (General NEWTON) has labored persistently, year by year, to influence the government to defend this harbor so that the great city may not stand in dread of an enemy. This is all that New York asks. Grant her this, or even refuse her this, and she will do as she has done before : she will be first and foremost in all the great enterprises, in all philanthropic movements ; and if a war comes she will furnish enough soldiers to defend the Union without outside help. (Applause and cheers.)

THE PRESIDENT:

COMRADES: The next toast is "The City of Brooklyn," and I introduce a gentleman whom you have heard before. (Applause and cheers.)

ADDRESS OF MAYOR LOW.

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN: The city of Brooklyn has been speaking for herself for two days (applause), and you might therefore think that it would be an easy task for me to respond in her behalf. But unless my memory fails me, I have responded to this toast before. I have on every proper occasion assured the different elements that go to make up the citizenship of the town that it is to them we owe the peculiar spirit of progress and of patriotism that is characteristic of the place. I have explained to the citizens of Brooklyn how natural it was that when the great oil industry was searching through this country for a point of vantage from which to illuminate the world, they should establish their headquarters in Brooklyn. I have explained to our citizens how it was natural that the great sugar industry, drawn there and kept there by the attractiveness of the maidenhood of Brooklyn, should establish its largest factories in our midst. (Laughter.) I have also pointed out to them how natural it is that in a city which is prepared to furnish the antidote for all the ills which municipal flesh is heir to, we should find located the principal establishment of the Pond's Extract Co.; and those of you who took part in the parade, I am very confident, if you had your eyes upon the streets on either side, are prepared to hear that Brooklyn is the home of Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup. (Laughter.) Now that all these things will explain themselves to you upon the hearing, I am convinced. The eternal fitness of things accounts for them all. But I have thought that you gentlemen who came from a distance would like some points in the geography of Brooklyn, in regard to which you may not be so fully posted. We have upon our eastern side East New York. We have upon our western border a town the correct name of which is West Brooklyn. (Laughter.) It is vulgarly known only as New York. You are yourselves all witnesses that upon our southern frontier is Coney Island, and we owe it, I regret to admit, to a fresh sea breeze that you are not advised even here and upon this occasion that we are bounded upon the north by Hunter's Point. (Laughter.)

I am reminded by the beautiful poem to which so many of us had the pleasure of listening yesterday that there are other directions in which I must bound this place; upward our limit is as high as heaven, and as deep below as tide water. Below tide water, away, way down, the city of New York claims jurisdiction under an ancient charter. (Laughter.)

But it now becomes me to tell you a little of the relations of the city to the art of war. Being myself a man of peace, you will understand that I am almost as reliable an authority as a metropolitan journal, and I want to begin, after the fashion of Irving in his Knickerbocker, a little way back, at the time of the Revolutionary war and the battle of Long Island, that took place here within the borders of what is now our city of Brooklyn. After that disastrous field, you may know the army retreated with considerable interest toward Fulton Ferry. There they were all huddled up in a mass, and in complete confusion. It so happened that a Tory lady resided in those days within a short distance of the ferry, and she had military instinct enough to see that if the British should advance at once the whole army would be captured. Consequently she sent her negro slave to the British to tell them to come on without delay. Now, the darkey struck the British lines where the Hessians were, and they never having seen a gentleman of his color thought that it was the Old Nick himself, and locked him up in the guard house over night. The consequence was that Washington and his army were preserved, and this gathering made possible here to-night. (Applause.) The point of which is twofold: first, that even in the Revolutionary war the colored man, now the colored citizen, was a not unimportant factor; and the other point is this: that, it having been found impossible to hold Brooklyn, even the Father of his Country made up his mind that it was not worth while to try to hold New York. (Laughter.)

Now, gentlemen, I told you last night that in this last war the city of Brooklyn sent to the front thirty thousand men. If there are any politicians here, they would sustain me, I am sure, in the statement that there is in our city one voter for every five of the population; and accepting that ratio as correct, one voter in every two in the city of Brooklyn marched to the front. The rest, I suppose, staid at home in the spirit of the ancient poet, "with young boys and gray headed men to keep the walls of Rome."

Gentlemen of the Society of the Army of the Potomac, in ancient Athens there was found a few years since a statue which has been called the "Wingless Victory," a beautiful image of Victory carved without wings, stooping to unloose her sandals, to indicate according to the beautiful conception of the sculptor that in Athens Victory had found a permanent home. It is the ideal of every man of Brooklyn that if he were to picture to the eye a statue which, to his mind, should image forth his city, it should be a beautiful picture of hospitality without wings and without sandals, that she might never fly from this city of our homes.

If we have not welcomed your Society this time according to that ideal, it is because we have fallen short in the power of expression, not in the feeling of the heart (applause); and we can only ask you to come to us another time, and we will try to do better. (Applause.) We should like to show you that as the years go by they do not bring forgetfulness to the people of Brooklyn of your heroic efforts and achievements, but as the numbers of your band grow smaller, the clearer shall grow the memory of both, until you pass to the great hereafter. (Loud and enthusiastic applause, and "Three cheers for Mayor Low.")

THE PRESIDENT:

COMRADES: The next regular toast is "The Army," and the last surviving commander of the Army of the Potomac will respond—General GEORGE B. McCLELLAN. Tmnultuous applnase greeted the announcement, with waving of hands and handkerchiefs, and three times three cheers were given.

ADDRESS OF GENERAL McCLELLAN.

MR. PRESIDENT AND COMRADES: The history of the American army is so long and glorious, so replete with instances of heroism and devotion on the battle field and of untiring patience under suffering and toil, the time would fail me were I to attempt the merest sketch of the eventful story. Nor would the limits within my control suffice were I to undertake the merest outline of the achievements of its commanders, beginning with the colossal figure of WASHINGTON and ending with those heroes of more recent times, SCOTT, GRANT, SHERMAN and SHERIDAN. But what American is there whose heart will not beat more quickly at the mere thought of the old Continental—ragged but magnificent; SCOTT's brigade at Lundy's Lane taking part in one of the few authentic instances where lines have actually met with the bayonet; that devoted band in Florida, of which all save one fell without an attempt to retreat, and lay stretched in death around the corpse of their heroic young commander, like Scotland's nobles around the body of their king on Flodham's fatal field; or the romantic campaigns of Mexico, or the desperate battles of our last war? But I shall content myself with a few brief sentences in regard to the peculiar nature and scope of the services rendered to our country by its permanent army.

Unlike those of other civilized nations, unless it be that of Great Britain, the American army rarely knows what it is to be in perfect peace. Other nations maintain their armies through an extended interval of tranquillity, and keep them ready for prompt action in case of war. The maxim "In time of peace prepare for war" is still observed. Those armies contain within themselves the means of sudden extension in the event of a sudden emergency, and when hostilities break out they are so large, so well equipped, so thoroughly trained, as to suffice for all the needs of war. Their strength is regulated by the work that they will be called upon to perform. With our army, the case is widely different. It knows no time of peace. It has never been large enough to perform its duties without undue loss or unless when supplemented by its sister army of the volunteers. It has always been forced to do its work with so much less than the requisite numbers that its losses are out of all proportion to those of other armies. Up to within a very recent period it has been broken into small fragments, and scattered widely through the Indian territory; cut off from all the safeguards of civilization; exposed to all degrees of cold and heat, hunger and thirst; every man carrying his life in his hand, and freely exposing it in contest with a merciless foe; supported in all this only by the approval of his comrades and the consciousness of work well and heroically performed; for rarely do brevets or rewards of any kind fall to the lot of those gallant men who withstand food and water, and day after day feel the dread of savages who never fight without the advantages in their favor. When all our wars have broken out, it has been necessary to supplement our army by volunteers. But it not only served as a nucleus to the army, but it supplied to the volunteers a knowledge of discipline and field duty without which an army is only a useless mob. More than this, it has always borne its whole share of the brunt of battle, and has so carried itself that all who have fought either by its side or against it have given it their esteem and respect. In our last war all who hear me will agree with me as to the immense service which the officers and men of the regular army rendered in advancing the knowledge and discipline of the volunteers by the aid of their experience, example and instruction. I am sure that all of you will agree in awarding to that little band the meed of praise that is its due for the valor displayed on every field in which it was engaged. None of you ever felt the worse for knowing that the regulars were by your side or in position to support you in case of need. (Applause.) It was my good fortune to pass my youth and early manhood in the regular army; afterward it fell to my lot to organize and command great masses of volunteers. (Great applause.) To both I owe the deepest admiration, the highest love. I belong to both, and my warmest, my most intense desire is that the strongest confidence and greatest esteem shall ever unite those two branches of the service, which in the future as in the past must act together in any war of magnitude. I can ask no more for the army than that in the future it shall sustain the proud reputation it has won in the past. In the long years during which so many of its officers have fulfilled the requirements of the French Marshal, that the best officer is the man who has no home but his [regiment, no fortune save his cloak and sword, now as in the past the vast majority of the officers of the old army value honor more than life. With such men, who would rather die than utter an untruth, we may be well secure of the honor of our flag. If your sons, gentlemen of the volunteers, give to the regular army in the future that same patriotic, disinterested and heroic support that you accorded it in your own generation, we need have no fear for our country when over the last one of us the drums have beaten that solemn march to the sounds of which we have already followed so many a gallant comrade to his last resting place. (Loud and prolonged applause and three cheers.)

THE PRESIDENT:

The next regular toast is "The Volunteers," to which General CHAMBERLAIN will respond. (Applause.)

ADDRESS OF GENERAL J. L. CHAMBERLAIN.

COMRADES OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC: This is a proper toast for this occasion, and most worthy, but you might well have called on some one more worthy to respond. Is not this army an army of volunteers? I need not tell you what you are; you know it very well. I shall not detract, nor attempt to, from the eloquent and truthful remarks which have been spoken of the regular army. Far be it from me, who had the privilege of serving with them, and whose services I witnessed, to withhold aught of the honor which is their due. Were I so recreant to memory and the truth, I should fear that those guns which thundered from Malvern Hill and Gettysburg would pour down upon me their awful reproach; I should fear that visions would rise and scare me from my dreams. I should see them again pouring down as they did from those heights of Roundtop—down into the swarming whirlpools of the overpowering foe at that point, and fighting front and rear and right and left. Less than one-half of the numbers that had gone into the fight came back through a track of glorious death and of deathless glory. But what I mean to say is that this Army of the Potomac in its organization was and is an army of volunteers, and you, gentlemen, our officers whom we delight to honor, from whose services, from whose popularity, from whose high example, we learned our discipline and also the technique of our military duties, did not you, gentlemen, consent to be detached from your regular army rank and to become officers of the volunteers? Was it not in that capacity, I ask, that you came to the volunteers? And was it not by the glorious valor, by the obedience unto death, of the army of volunteers that you proved yourselves worthy to hold the distinguished places we are proud to see you in to-night? (Applause.)

But what is a volunteer? How are we volunteers? Why, simply because, knowing the purpose and the special service to which we were called, we went into that purpose of our own free will. We knew what we were about, and when the service was done the war was over and the victory won. What is the volunteer in another sense but the people themselves—the physical force obeying the moral force? For in this Society we call the people not only physical forces but moral forces, and there are crises when those moral forces, when those thoughts, ideas, aspirations, when those things you might call moral and spiritual forces, are obliged to fall back upon the physical forces; no, not fall back—they call the physical to the front, and thus they defend the great ideas in the minds of the people—that is what the volunteers are.

The rank and file of the professional army have not those thoughts or the kind of discipline which are needed to make them sensitive to the influence of the leaders of the people or to enable them to sympathize with great forward movements in the way of liberty. The officers feel it, but it is impossible for the merely professional army to be imbued with those great, all-pervading principles. The Constitution itself declares that the right to bear arms shall not be forbidden to the people, recognizing the fact that the chief defence is in the volunteers, in the people themselves. And yet the regular army is the school, the nursery, the nucleus, as General McClellan said, which shall preserve the traditions and the prestige we need to make our loyalty effective. (Applause.) But an army never dies, and such an army is never discharged. Do you remember that order which discharged the Army of the Potomac? Was there ever an order so thrilling to our souls? The order came, "This army as an organization ceases to exist." As an organization in another sense can it cease to exist? But mark the reservation of words: "As an organization it is no longer borne on the rolls of the United States." It is borne upon the rolls of undying fame and life. Thank you, gentlemen of the War Department, thank you, Mr. President, thank God for the inspiration of that acknowledgment of the impotence of any power on God's earth to obliterate the Army of the Potomac. (Applause).

Who that sees you to-night can believe that the Army of the Potomac has ceased to exist? Who that saw you yesterday or to-day can believe that army has ceased to exist? No! It will live as long as on this broad continent that flag floats. As long as the world shall care for what is dear to the heart of humanity, so long the volunteers will live, and the Army of the Potomac will exist. (Long and loud applause and cheers.)

THE PRESIDENT:

COMRADES: The next regular toast is "The Bench and Bar." General CALVIN E. PRATT, Justice of the Supreme Court of New York, will respond. (Applause.)

ADDRESS OF GENERAL CALVIN E. PRATT.

This scene reminds me much more vividly of the bar than the bench. These two words have been coupled together upon this occasion not from any natural connection, except possibly upon the Darwinian theory of evolution that a judge is an evolved lawyer (to which, however, there are many notable exceptions), but in the nature of a legal notice, at this stage of your proceedings, that too much of the bar may result to-morrow morning in an appearance before the bench. During the two hours that have been kindly allotted by the committee for the elaboration of this toast (laughter), I hope to be able to trace the history of the legal profession from 1701, the time when, as history tells us, an attorney was first known to swear to an oath of office, down to the close of the late unpleasantness. The institution of this profession is a necessary consequence of a civilized state of society. With organized communities come all the forms and attributes necessary to protect person and property. The more men come in contact the more collisions occur.

and the weak and unwary seek protection against the strong, cunning and unscrupulous. Courts had to be instituted to adjust differences without force, and with courts came lawyers as a vital necessity, as it was found that the same man could not try both sides of a case and then decide it. (Laughter.) All history shows that the more progress a country has made in civilization and refinement, the more learned, just and honorable has been the legal profession. Nay more, the legal profession has always stood on the highest citadel of society to watch the first approach of tyranny and injustice and to interpose a shield against unbridled power. In every great conquest of humanity against oppression, it has been in the full front of the battle. We are indebted to the bar for the liberty of the press, and the Constitution and the laws under which we live. No profession is so intimately connected with the community in its wants and interests, or exercises so controlling an influence over affairs. Perhaps I may be permitted to say that lawyers have been equally prominent in war. They have divided the honors of the office of President of the country with great soldiers almost continuously since the days of Washington; seventeen of the whole number who have held that office belonged to the legal profession. You all know the services rendered by lawyers in our great war. No profession or calling compared with it in the number of officers sent to the field. (Applause.) My old regiment, the Thirty-first New York, alone had ten lawyers among its officers, and our worthy president, General Newton, will testify, if properly cross-examined, that it was the soothing and law abiding influence of the old Thirty-first that made the Sixth Corps the model of judicial decorum throughout the army. (Laughter.) In that corps larceny was unknown in the day time, and virtue and temperance were practised as professions. (Laughter.) You all remember that when the government at Washington was in a dilemma—how, at the same time, to abolish slavery, to please the loyal Governors and not violate the “sacred instrument”—it called upon the irrepressible and imperturbable Massachusetts lawyer who invented the word contraband, and the problem was solved in a legal manner. When, again, it was thought to be a bad bargain to exchange Confederates who would be conscripted into the Southern army for men whose term of service had expired, and who, perhaps, thought they would let their wives’ relatives take a hand in putting down the wicked and unholy rebellion (laughter), this same lawyer was again called upon to carry out this cruel scheme, and his fertile brain again satisfied the loyal people who stayed at home that a “man and a brother” was worth more than a volunteer whose term of service had expired! But not only in high command or select councils was the legal profession found. In every battle from

Ball's Bluff, where Baker fell and Devens won immortal honors, to Five Forks, the crowning signal of peace, lawyers were in the front rank, battling that the Constitution and laws might be upheld. (Applause.) But I fear to incur the displeasure of a profession whose modesty is proverbial by making even a mild statement of admitted facts. (Laughter.) I now turn to the other side of the toast, where we find a guild that is never surfeited with the incense of praise or cringes under the pruning knife of criticism. It would be interesting to have the history of the bench, for it goes back to the time when the "light of truth and the uncertainty of tradition are inseparable." We read that judges ruled Israel. I am not much of a Biblical scholar, but I assume there were no lawyers or judges in the time of Cain, as we are not informed that after he left any proceedings were taken to "extradite" him. Whether he was branded in pursuance of a sentence of a court martial, history fails to give us any record. There was a time, when Massachusetts had been settled about as long as Nebraska, over whose judiciary my brother Cobb so ably presides, when a man most vehemently protested against the administration of justice lest the morals of the people might be corrupted. (Laughter.) Yet there was something very significant, from which we may "point a moral or adorn a tale," in the manner in which justice was dealt out, for we read that one David Clark was fined forty shillings for being an immoderate drinker, and "John Wedgewood was set in the stocks for being in the company of drunkards." There are certain psychological peculiarities of army officers and judges that have never been satisfactorily explained, since army officers are retired at 64 with pay and judges at 70 without pay. (Laughter.) The former arrive at 64 very early in life, while judges grow younger as the years progress. (Laughter.) There is one point I desire to make, when I state that there is not a people on God's footstool that have such a profound respect for law and its proper administration as ourselves. The reason is that we elect our judges, restrict and define their powers and retain the dearest right of all, a trial by jury. I need not suggest how judges might have been useful in the army. They would, undoubtedly, have proved inconvenient upon court martial, as it would be impossible to divine what the decision would be before the evidence was heard (laughter); but one thing is certain: that, had judges or a jury been employed in such courts, the ineffable disgrace of hanging a woman without sufficient proof and convicting one of the most gallant and accomplished officers in the army never would have rested upon the country. (Applause.)

The bench and an intelligent jury, assisted by a learned and honest bar, sustained by the citizen soldiery, with fidelity to the law, forms the only sure foundation upon which rests the liberty, property and happiness of the people. (Great applause.)

THE PRESIDENT :

The next regular toast is "The Press," to which ANDREW McLEAN, Esq., Editor of the Brooklyn Eagle, will respond. (Applause.)

ADDRESS OF MR. McLEAN.

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN : A little earlier in the evening I heard some of our friends give notice that they desired no politics here. When I heard that, I assure you my heart fell within me, because I could see no reason why the press should be toasted unless for political purposes. If you look at me with critical eyes, you will see I am a stump speaker born. (Laughter.) At a gathering of this kind there are, as you will well believe, very few things to be said about the press ; and particularly in a city like Brooklyn, and at a time like this, when you have come together under most hospitable and happy auspices. But when men are jovial and happy, and living in the light of memory and good fellowship, the press can at least record the spirit that has brought them together and the manifestations of their hearts. And the spirit of my own profession rises within me, for though I have no shield or spear to show, I can still look back to journalists who, though they marched not to the front with you, and knew not the shock of battle, yet stood another charge, faced another shock, and had in their hearts strong and unquenchable the patriotism that moved you all. (Applause.) I believe, gentlemen—I am sure—without abating—and nothing could be further from my mind than to abate in any way the honor and glory that belongs to the true soldier—that the journalist in his own way did not a little to organize the Army of the Potomac, did not a little to fill it with spirit when it went to the front, did not a little to keep its courage up, did not a little to fill its broken ranks, did not a little to warm the hearts of women and children and keep alive their spirit ; and when the triumph came and the eagles perched upon your banners, it taught you to be kindly in the hour of victory. It told all soldiers that the time had come to ground their arms and befriend the foe, and particularly it reminded all men that our fight was not for aggrandizement, not for revenge, but for a great principle ; and that when the principle was won the nobler victory was yet to be achieved, the victory you have successfully attained, the victory of forgiveness that makes you heroes. (Applause.)

As for myself, gentlemen, I am not a member of the Army of the Potomac, but I have the proud honor, in addition to being a journalist, of having served this republic in the noble capacity of a powder monkey in the navy. (Laughter and applause.) When that noble and venerable gentleman (Mr. Beecher) who has left us was speaking, I thought of the day when I was a little lad living in a Scottish village, when the men who are here to-night were at the front, some of them taking wounds in their breasts that will never be healed, some of them leaving limbs that will never be restored, not a few of them looking upon comrades who would never again march to the sound of drums. I was a little lad in a Scottish village then, and the news of the battle came and came to us in that village from my kinsmen, and gradually my spirit rose and my heart was with the Army of the Potomac. And one day from the battle of Chancellorsville a soldier came home sorely wounded, sent back home to Brooklyn to recover, and he was told by his physician that perhaps there would be a chance for his life if he went to his native country. He came to his relatives in my native town. He was my uncle. I saw him weary and broken with the strife through which he had gone. I could not carry a heavy gun, but I could do something for this Union, and I did all the something a little lad could do. I ran away from home, worked my passage, and went on the Potomac flotilla and served my country there as I have told you. (Great applause, and three cheers.)

And so, gentlemen, while you gather in these pleasant assemblies and recite your defeats and victories over again, and recall all the thoughts and all the reminiscences that knit men to each other, although I am not a member of your organization, although I have been carried far away from the profession of arms, I beg you to believe that while I do what I can for my country in my chosen profession, I am somewhat aware, somewhat alive to the emotions that move in the breasts of soldiers that know the whole significance of battle. (Applause.) I think, however, gentlemen, that as we gather here—and it is a thought that has often come to me while passing over ground like this—that no assembly of men like those who fought for the flag which floats over our heads triumphant can be held on any ground so fitly as on this. I never pass through Prospect Park, I never come to Coney Island, without thinking of the battle field to which a previous speaker referred. Never indeed without the words of Bryant ringing in my ears :

“What though upon the dust thou lie
When those who helped thee flee in fear.
Die full of hope and manly trust,
Like those who fell in battle here.

“Another hand thy sword shall wield,
Another hand thy standard wave,
Till from the trumpet's mouth is pealed
The note of triumph o'er thy grave.

“Truth crushed to earth shall rise again,
The eternal years of God are hers,
But error, wounded, writhes in pain
And dies among his worshippers.”

(Great applause, and three cheers for the speaker.)

THE PRESIDENT :

The next regular toast is “The Orator of the Day.” General PORTER will respond. (Applause.)

ADDRESS OF GENERAL PORTER.

MR. PRESIDENT AND COMRADES : If my memory serves me right, there was a very unpleasant feature in artillery practice known as shelling out. I feel just now as if you had completely shelled me out, and when asked to speak in the midst of this somewhat vociferous assemblage, may I not say in the language of the great dramatist, “Since first I followed arms, ne’er met I with an enterprize more hazardous or desperate than this.” I don’t know whether you can hear any of the speakers on this platform. I know you can scarcely see any of them, because this room seems to have been constructed architecturally for the express purpose of receiving the Army of the Potomac, and for receiving them with columns doubled on the centre. (Laughter.) There is an old adage which says, “A pitcher taken too often to the well is apt to be broken.” If after the somewhat prolonged remarks that I made last evening, and to which you listened with a heroism worthy of a better cause, and a fortitude worthy of the Spartans of old, and for which I thank you very much, I should attempt to make any extensive remarks to-night, I should feel that if my pitcher were not broken, it would be very badly cracked. The only fault I had to find last night was that your Committee of Arrangements did not place a placard over the head of your orator, reading in the lines of that one which was once placed over the head of a piano player in a saloon in Nevada, which said, “Don’t shoot the performer; he is doing the best he can.” (Laughter.) And I might have added a line myself to that placard, taken from the closing language of bills of complaint in chancery suits—“and your orator will ever pray.” (Laughter.) I understood that when the rain began last night your Committee of Arrangements had had their preparations made to have this great city lighted by that newly discovered dark moon of Professor Wiggins, but like the dark horse in the Chicago convention, it didn’t turn up. (Laughter.)

I felt no little embarrassment last night. I couldn’t pretend to compete, for instance, with the speech of your honored Mayor.

(Applause.) Before he had spoken ten minutes, he brought down flat on the stage a uniformed veteran of the Army of the Potomac. (Loud laughter.) It was one of the most striking speeches of the occasion. (Laughter.) I said to myself, "The next thing his Honor will bring down the house"—and he did. (Applause.) That soldier had stood up manfully through four years of war. He couldn't stand up ten minutes against that speech. (Great laughter.) Comrades, I have the highest military authority for not prolonging my remarks to-night, namely, that old adage in the army which says, "A soldier ought never to open his mouth except to tear a cartridge." I have moreover no less authority than Shakspeare himself, who says, "A soldier ought never to wear his dagger in his mouth;" and before I proceed far I expect to hear some of you say, in the language of Shakspeare's soldier, "And yet when blows have made me stay, I fled from words." I congratulate you upon the great reception you have had; being received by the distinguished men of yonder city; being welcomed here to-night by the great preacher of Brooklyn, who with that great independence of action characteristic of religion has disappeared at an early hour (laughter); he who does not hesitate to step down from the pulpit, don our army blue, and march forth as chaplain of one of our most gallant regiments. When we look upon him and think of the man preacher and then of the man militant, we go back to his New England ancestry, and feel that there must flow in his full veins the blood of a Cotton Mather and a Miles Standish. So much has this New England ancestry impressed itself upon all Brooklyn, that the people on the other side of the river, in the place designated by his Honor the Mayor as "West Brooklyn," have grave doubts constantly arising in their minds as to whether the Pilgrim Fathers really landed at Plymouth Rock or at Plymouth Church. (Laughter and applause.)

Comrades, I congratulate you upon coming down here to-night to taste the breezes of the sea, and to sit down for a time upon the banks of the ocean. It is regarded as nothing singular to us in New York. People there for the last month have been doing nothing else but sitting down on the banks. I heard some one to-night outside trying to whistle that old, familiar tune, "I know a bank whereon the wild thyme grows." I said that is nothing. We know plenty of banks in New York on which the time grows so wild that they won't loan except on call. When I came down a little late this evening, I was told that the Army of the Potomac had been here. I said, "It is impossible." I had observed particularly that the cattle had been left grazing in the fields. I saw horses in the roadways uncaptured; smoke houses had not been despoiled. I observed that all fences were intact, even including the top rail.

(Laughter.) I said, "The Army of the Potomac has not been here." But when I entered this hall and saw the commissary, unlike the former practice of commissaries, doing all the foraging himself, the problem became more easy of solution. When I saw you sitting here partaking of these "things which perish by the using" and in such a company perish so rapidly, I said, "If this be the work of veterans, what would you not do to a dinner if still on the active list?" I saw you here wearing every sort badge under the sun except the blue ribbon of the teetotaler; saw you flanked by bottles instead of batteries, not thinking how much better is the pungent ocean smell than the perfume of these bottles, forgetting entirely the lines of Miss Carpenter's poem:

"Softly come the breezes from the South
 Skipping seaward o'er the tossing brine,
 Wafting a strange salt odor to the mouth
 Sweeter than any famed bouquet of wine."

Let me only say in conclusion (cries of "Go on! Go on!")—no, gentlemen, I am already subject to arrest—after the battle of Spottsylvania our headquarters stopped one day at a house in which a Southern lady was living who had just come from Richmond. She had been telling us how she lived there, every day looking upon the Union prisoners at Belle Isle. One of our corps commanders coming along, as his corps was passing, looked at it with honest pride, and said to this lady, "Madame, I suppose you have never seen so many Union soldiers before." She replied, "No, not at liberty." I have been accustomed to see the Army of the Potomac in line of battle, and under great restraint; and if a person should ask me to-night if I had ever seen so many members of the Army of the Potomac together before, I should say, "No, not at liberty." (Great applause.)

THE PRESIDENT:

The next regular toast is "The Poet of the Day." Hon. JOHN SAVAGE will respond. (Applause.)

ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN SAVAGE.

MR. PRESIDENT AND—I AM INSTRUCTED TO SAY—COMRADES (for I understand that last evening, after I left, by a law of the Society, the humble poet of the patriotic occasion was made a comrade forever—applause): I feel proud of the honor, and I wish publicly to say so. You heard me last evening with a most profound attention, and rewarded my heartfelt, however inadequate, effort with an enthusiasm of appreciation that carried me entirely away, and from the pleasurable excitement of which I have scarcely yet recovered. I desire now to do what I could not do then—to return you my most sincere thanks for the manner in which you received me, and the kindness and patience with which you listened to me. (Mr. Savage said he was in great hopes that the orator of the day, who had just spoken, would have returned thanks for both, as they were taken in together as a sort of literary parenthesis in the programme; and regretting he had not, branched off into a series of pleasant impromptu verses, which the stenographers did not take down, supposing the speaker had them written, which proved not to be the case. As Mr. Savage's off-hand couplets brought in the names of Mayor SETH LOW, of the President—General NEWTON—of the next President—General GRANT—of General SLOCUM, he was interrupted by rounds of applause, and when finally he alluded to General MCCLELLAN, the cheers were uproarious and long continued.)

Resuming, Mr. Savage said: I don't want to prolong these remarks, but a little reminiscence is brought to mind by the beautiful speech of the representative of the press here, on my right, so full of feeling and nature and, consequently, of true poetry. It reminded me of my early association with the Potomac, if not with the Army of the Potomac. When I was out in the early part of '61 with the old 69th of New York, it fell to my part to take over from the college grounds at Georgetown, where the regiment had been stationed, to the new fort we were ordered to build—Fort Corcoran—the flagstaff and the flag; and it was the first flag of the Union that waved over any Union battlements on the rebel dominion. (Applause.) The first national starry flag raised over battlements on the Virginia side of the Potomac; and it brought many, many, memories to my mind which it would take volumes to perpetuate. I will therefore not delay you at this hour with any of these memories—so variously cheerful and sad, heart-stirring, romantic, tragic, and patriotic—but simply recall to you the duty which your heroism has so nobly illustrated and fulfilled, the duty that every man owes to his flag and country, in the words of the poet:

“A nation's flag, a nation's flag—
If wickedly unrolled,
May foes in adverse battle drag
Its every fold from fold.
But in the cause of Liberty,
Guard it 'gainst Earth and Hell;
Guard it till Death or Victory—
Look you, you guard it well!
No saint or king has tomb so proud
As he whose flag becomes his shroud.”

MR. SAVAGE retired amid hearty cheers.

THE PRESIDENT :

The next and last regular toast is "The Women in the War." In the absence of General DEVENS, General BEAVER has consented to respond. (Applause.)

ADDRESS OF GENERAL JAMES A. BEAVER.

When the gentleman who first opened the remarks on this occasion said that it were better that the men who came home with armless sleeves and legless pantaloons had laid down their lives on the battle field, I responded to that sentiment by this—that if the men who are here to-night who carry those empty sleeves and legs, should enter the war to-night with a full knowledge of what they brought out of it, they would go into it just as bravely and cheerfully as they did at first. (Applause.)

Boys, do you know where the inspiration comes from that begets a feeling like that in the hearts of the soldiers of the United States to-day? It comes from the women of America.

Living, as we do, in this busy, absorbing, active present of ours, in which the demands of everyday life can bind us with such consuming care and grasping greed, we forget the past and the claims which the past has upon us. But when we come to this annual gathering of the Army of the Potomac, we are not forgetful of that past; and as we come together, since I have enjoyed these Re-unions, we have once and again and always responded to this toast. I remember after the first assault upon Petersburg, as I lay with a shell wound in my side in a little cot in the rear of the battle field, when the dying were all around me in that little room, there came in at the door like an angel of mercy a woman from Massachusetts, with a short check dress and a little cross around her neck; and with the instinct of a woman she went around among us, and selected one who lay upon the floor. She knelt by his side, for she knew he was the dying man, and with a woman's heart ministered to him the last offices of religion. And when she asked if she should sing for him, I remember the hush that settled upon us as her voice went up in song and stilled the suffering around her. Oh! my comrades, if we could measure the devotion of the women who followed us! And I remember that little woman afterward, when I was carried nine miles on a stretcher. She came to me to a house in the rear of Petersburg, and ministered to me as only a woman can, and I believe she was one of the instruments of saving me and preserving me to this day. But, comrades, when we talk about the women of the war, let us remember that as we recall the hardships of the conflict, and its sacrifices, let us remember that the women suffered as we could not suffer. Not only the women of the North, but of the South; and the Southern army could not have been maintained in the field for two years but for the indomitable pluck, energy, push, and perseverance that were imparted to that army by the women in the South. (Applause.) "Loyalty" was their watchword. Wrong as we believe them to have been, they believed they were right; and we honor them because, believing they were right, they gave their hearts, their prayers, their jewelry, their very clothing, in order that their men might be supplied with the munitions of war; and when we come to pay a tribute to the women of the war, let us not forget that the women of the South were just as brave and patriotic as the women of the North. Let us gather up in our meed of praise the women of this country, North and South, whose impulses were on the side of what they believed to be right, and who were willing to sacrifice everything they held dear in order that the cause they believed in might win. Although the result proved they were wrong, in the sufferings and sacrifices that came to them they have dearly and doubly paid for that wrong; and when we talk about the angel of peace hovering over this country let us gather under his wings the women of this land, and aid them in every effort made by them in behalf of those committed to their care. (Loud and long applause.)

BUMMERS' MEETING.

The regular exercises being now concluded, the Bummers' Meeting was announced, and General SHARPE presided. The usual fun and regulated disorder prevailed until a little after midnight, and the "revellers," with band playing, marched in procession to the train.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE FIRST CORPS.

The Association of the First Army Corps assembled in the Court of Sessions Chamber, County Court House, Brooklyn, N. Y., at 10 A. M. June 11, 1884. Thirty members were in attendance.

In the absence of the President, Colonel G. G. BENEDICT, detained by severe illness at his home in Burlington, Vt., the First Vice-President, Colonel ISAAC S. TICHENOR, called the meeting to order.

The proceedings were opened by a brief address from the Chair, who expressed his pleasure at meeting again the members of the Association, gathered together to revive old memories and to provide for the preparation and publication of the true history of the Corps.

Dr. FLORENCE DONOHUE, in the absence of Captain BURRITT, acted as Recording Secretary.

The minutes of the last meeting, held in Washington, were read and approved.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SECOND CORPS.

The eighth annual meeting of the Second Corps Club was convened in the County Court House, at Brooklyn, L. I., June 11, at 11 o'clock A. M., the President, General JAS. A. BEAVER, in the chair. Nearly one hundred and fifty members were present at some part of the meeting. The reports of the Secretary and Treasurer were presented and accepted. JOSEPH W. KAY presented the following resolutions, which after some discussion were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Second Army Corps, in Annual Session assembled, urge upon all in authority, with appointing power, to give full force and effect to the provisions of Section 1754, in regard to persons honorably discharged from the Military and Naval Service of the U. S. during the late war, in order that the preference therein contained may receive strict enforcement; also,

Resolved, That we heartily approve of the Amendments of Section 1754, introduced in Congress at the present session, giving preference to honorably discharged Union Soldiers and Sailors without regard to the cause of such discharge;

Resolved, That a copy of these Resolutions, duly authenticated, be forwarded to the President, the heads of the several Departments at Washington, the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, asking such attention thereto as the subject deserves.

Major W. D. W. MILLER moved, and it was voted, that a committee of three be appointed to draft memorial resolutions on the death of General A. A. HUMPHREYS, General W. G. MITCHELL, and Dr. A. N. DOUGHERTY.

Major MILLER, Dr. W. W. POTTER, and Major J. S. McEWAN constituted the committee, which reported as follows:

Your Committee on Necrology respectfully presents the following report:

Maj.-Gen. ANDREW A. HUMPHREYS died at Washington, D. C., since our last meeting.

General HUMPHREYS, by education and training, acquired those sterling qualities of head and heart which rendered him admirably fitted for the sphere in which he was called upon to act. He was, at once, the embodiment of the brave soldier, the wise counsellor, and the scholarly man. His place in the late war was a conspicuous one from the outset. As brigade, division, and corps commander, as well as Chief of Staff of the Army of the Potomac, and as Chief of Engineers of the Army of the U. S., he was called to exercise such a versatility of talent as seldom falls to the lot of one man. It is not too much to say that in each, and every one of these places, besides others which he filled, General HUMPHREYS was never found wanting in all that goes to make the ideal soldier as well as the true man.

The Second Corps Club desires to place this testimonial to its late commander on record, as a feeble acknowledgment of the services of a brave, gallant, and skilful officer, who endeared himself to us not less by his courteousness as a gentleman than by his prowess as a soldier.

Appropriate resolutions were also read in memory of Col. ALEX. N. DOUGHERTY, M.D., who died November 29, 1882, at Newark, N. J., and of Major and Brevet Colonel WILLIAM G. MITCHELL, Assistant Adjutant-General, U. S. A., who died at Governor's Island, May 30, 1883. Capt. W. D. FISKE moved, and it was voted that a committee of three be appointed to report a list of officers for the ensuing year. Capt. FISKE, Gen. J. S. SMITH and Gen. WM. DE LACY served as this committee, and made the following report, which was unanimously adopted:

President: Gen. WINFIELD S. HANCOCK, New York.

Vice-Presidents: Gen. GERSHOM B. MOTT, New Jersey; Maj. W. D. W. MILLER, New Jersey; Col. SAMUEL A. MOORE, Connecticut.

Secretary and Treasurer: JOHN D. BILLINGS, Massachusetts.

Executive Committee: JOSEPH KAY, New York; Col. GEO. F. HOPPER, New York; Gen. J. B. COIT, Connecticut; Col. W. H. D. COCHRANE, New Hampshire; Lient. DENNIS LINEHAN, Massachusetts.

Historian: Gen. FRANCIS A. WALKER, Massachusetts.

Vice-President, Society Army of the Potomac: Gen. SELDEN CONNOR, Maine.

General HANCOCK was present, and was received with rounds of cheers, after which he shook each of the veterans present warmly by the hand. At a later stage of the meeting, on being called upon, he addressed the Club briefly. Gen. MOTT was also present, but on being called upon declined to make any remarks. The President expressed his regrets at the enforced absence of the Historian, and called upon the Secretary for information with regard to the progress of the work. This the latter gave as far as he was able, and then called on all field and line officers, who had not already done so, to put themselves in communication with Gen. WALKER.

The Club then adjourned for dinner, and afterward assembled in front of the City Hall, where they were photographed, and thence marched to the Academy of Music to join in the business meeting of the Society of the Army of the Potomac.

Secretary.

As he did not know that he would be called upon to preside at this meeting till this moment, he should not make any further remarks, and announced that the regular order of business would be proceeded with.

A letter was read from Major F. W. SIMONS, 8th Maryland Infantry, Baltimore, asking this (the Sixth) Corps to support an application that would be made to the Society of the Army of Potomac, for that body to hold its next Re-union in Baltimore. The Vice-President shall be chosen by the members of each corps, by a majority vote of the members of the respective corps present.

ARTICLE IV.

Political or any other discussions foreign to the purposes of this Society as set forth in this Constitution, at any of the meetings, or any proceeding of such a tendency, are declared inimical to the purposes of this organization and are prohibited.

ARTICLE V.

This Constitution may be altered or amended at any regular meeting of the Society, provided the alteration or amendment proposed is submitted in writing, and filed with the Recording Secretary at least three months before the regular meeting at which it is proposed to present the same; and provided further, that two-thirds of the members present at such meeting vote in favor thereof.

BY-LAWS.

1. Every officer and enlisted man desiring to become a member of this Society shall, upon giving his assent to the Constitution, pay to the Treasurer the sum of one dollar as an initiation fee, and each year thereafter the sum of two dollars as annual dues, and shall thereupon be entitled to a copy of the proceedings of the Society, when published, free of charge.

2. No member shall be entitled to vote who shall be in arrears.

3. The diploma of membership, and the badge which shall be adopted by the Society, shall be delivered to each member on payment of a fixed sum, sufficient to pay the cost thereof.

4. The Treasurer shall disburse all the moneys of the Society upon the order of the Executive Committee, attested by the signature of the Chairman, and shall, at each annual meeting, make a report in detail of his receipts and disbursements.

The Treasurer shall be required to give bonds in the amount of ten thousand dollars, to be approved by the Executive Committee.

5. When the place of the annual meeting shall be decided upon, the President shall appoint an Executive Committee of one member from each of the corps enumerated in Article III., Section 1, of the Constitution, whose duty it shall be to make all needful preparations and arrangements for such meeting. The Committee thus appointed shall be selected, as far as practicable, from the residents of the place of meeting.

6. No member of this Society shall speak more than once on any subject or question of business, and no longer than five minutes, without the consent of the Society first obtained.

7. The successive Executive Committee shall in due session select an Orator from the members of the Society to deliver an address appropriate to the occasion at each annual meeting.

8. The Recording Secretary shall cause a book of records to be kept, exhibiting the address and occupation of every member of this Society.

9. The President shall appoint Tellers for the elections required by the Constitution.

Prior to balloting for the place for the holding the next annual meeting the President shall appoint a Committee of five, who shall report three places for the meeting, and the balloting shall be confined to the places named.

10. The election of officers shall be conducted as follows :

First—A ballot for President, to be continued until some member receives a majority of the votes cast.

Second—The Vice-Presidents shall be selected by the respective Corps and elected by the Society.

Third—A ballot for Corresponding Secretary, Recording Secretary, and Treasurer, on a single ticket, the balloting to be continued until these officers are elected by a majority of the votes cast.

In balloting for officers other than the Vice-Presidents the votes shall be deposited in a box in charge of the Tellers, placed in front of the platform, and the Corps shall vote in succession in the order named in Article III., Section 1, of the Constitution.

11. In the absence of the President, the Vice-President senior in rank in the Volunteer Service present at the meeting shall preside.

12. The Recording Secretary must notify all the officers of the Society, and the Executive Committee, of any proposed amendment of the Constitution, immediately upon receipt thereof, and publish the same in such journals as the President may direct.

13. A full report of each meeting shall be printed, and copies forwarded to every member entitled to receive the same.

14. Honorary members may be elected by a three fourths vote of the members present at any annual meeting.

15. A majority vote of all the members present at any regular meeting shall be required to alter or amend these By-Laws.
